Seth gets screwed

I don't know, but I kind of feel that my columns this year are not quite as good as they were last year. I am getting old and decrepit. My cynicism is getting stale and the emotional trauma that I put you, the reader, through is unnecessary.

Not only that, but I tell stories that you, the reader, probably don't give a flying hoot about. That's unfortunate.

Well, instead of getting angry and childish about the situation, I will write about what all you poopy-pants stupid-heads want to read.

Seth Koenig

To make sure I knew exactly what the mass populous would want to see in a newspaper text, I went and investigated several scientific studies. Upon viewing the magazine rack at the mall's bookstore, I came up with this fascinating conclusion:

People are only interested in sex. That's right, sex. You say it doesn't matter to you, but you're a liar. Each and every magazine that is there on the magazine rack is there because it sells, and it sells because you, the general population, buy it. Therefore, it can be assumed that you, the general population, support the content of these selling magazines: Sex. The fact that it's called a magazine rack should tell you something, right.

Let's review the topics on the covers of these glossy, flop-ps pieces of literature, shall we?

How to keep your man coming back for more!
Learn how to turn her on!
Eighty-three new positions that will keep your love life hot!

Thank you. Case closed. Now, playing the odds, I would say that if I talked about sex for exorbitant periods of time, you would be happy. If I said something like, say, "slip it in," most of you would first think of something other than passing a paper in late under a professor's door. Am I right?

Now I've decided that I can keep your attention by going on a mindless tirade on the subject of eroticism.

It is lucky for you that I decided this, as I am the leading expert on the subject. This sarcasm is illustrated best as I insert my version of experience into a hypothetical NBC news show timeline:

In what year did all of the following events happen?

The dinosaurs finally went extinct, after battling with the ecological changes felt by a dangerous meteor blast (or so we theorize). Politician Bob Dole evolved from the ape to become the first human being ever (or so we theorize). Collegian columnist Seth Koenig last engaged in sexual activity (or so we theorize). Was it

A.) Too long ago to possibly remember.

B.) So long ago that the details of the events are fuzzy at best.

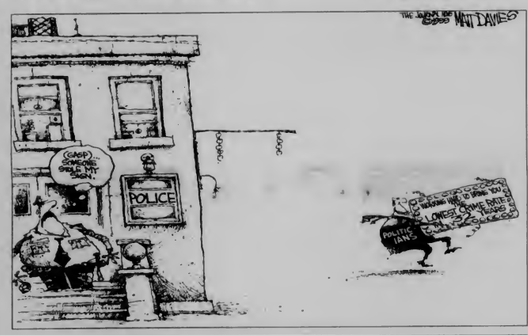
D.) 1819.

Your guess is as good as mine. Anyway, I will try to recreate the evening using the rock carvings and symbolic stick formations available from the site of the engagement and come up with some sort of useful banter.



From what I can decipher, the event involved all sorts of what they used to call "petting," and there was a lot of sweat and sexual noises and tongues put into action for various purposes. If my memory serves me correctly, the whole thing was kind of fun. Check the history books, do research, write a term paper and come and see me.

Anyway, in a nutshell, I recommend all of the overused, obvious things, like role-playing and covering each other with much of the same condiments that one would use in decorating an ice cream sundae. I then recommend acting on that other person in much of the same way that one would an ice cream sundae.

There, now I have created a point to all of this. Sex is like ice cream: sloppy, wet, sweet and fulfilling. Also, it is inexpensive, unless you go get the good stuff – which, in my opinion, is always all-natural, although Britney Spears and Jennifer Love Hewitt would disagree.

All in all, though, if your whole life revolves around sex, you shouldn't be talking to me… you should be making oodles of cash as a magazine executive.

Coke screws millions

The mad scientists down at C.O.K.E., (cancerous organism killing everybody) Central have developed a new weapon of astonishing might to use in their war of soda hegemony. Coke now has the technology to produce "smart" vending machines, machines capable of sticking it to us when we want to buy Coke.

Paul Kitchin

Each new machine has a thermometer and can be programmed to automatically raise its own prices when it gets hot outside and people are thirstier. Similarly, the machines can raise prices to best exploit higher demand; when people buy Coke from the machine, the infernal device can raise its prices if it determines that lots of people purchase from it. Hi there 2nd floor Webster.

While this may disgust some of you and send you into convulsions of anti-greed hysteria, I cannot but laugh. Yes, these new abilities are perhaps reprehensible from the consumer point of view, but what self-respecting soft drink dealer wouldn't want to wield the same power? I say good for them! I never buy anything from snack machines anyway, so it doesn't hurt me. I find their craftiness supreme, and I LOOOOVE craftiness.

Check this out: Q— What did the grape say when the elephant sat on him. A— Nothing, he just let out a little whine. (Thanks to Doctor Fool for that bit of humor.)

So, how about Star Wars Episode II? I liked number 1 myself, although it had drawbacks. Jar-Jar isn't so bad. Admit it, he is just a scapegoat that talk show hosts poke fun at for easy jokes. Get over it.

Yeah, it wasn't the best, but I found it only slightly less magical than the first three. My only complaint was the really long intermission for the whole pod-race-win-Anakin-in-a-bet section, which was long and arduous.

But Episode II will rock!! It is supposed to be a dark romance set against the backdrop of the Clone Wars. That means more star-fighter combat and brooding tensions. Think of The Empire Strikes Back — the second film is where everything goes to hell and ends with the heroes up the creek without a paddle.

What did the D.C. do with our breakfast sandwiches? I want them back. I say we have a socialist revolution and punish the capitalist pigs that sold our breakfast sandwiches to evil dictators suppressing workers' revolts in the Third World. And I want sausage. I LOVE bacon, don't doubt it, but they haven't had sausage for brunch in weeks and all the bacon is killing me. I just can't keep away from it.

Who saw Rocky Horror? What did you think? I had fun with it and got a bit dolled up, but wow, some people went to great lengths (read: too far) to be freaky that night. By the way, I WAS a RHPS virgin! Ha ha, you fools! You've fallen victim to one of the classic blunders. The first is never get involved in a land war in Asia, but only slightly less well known is this: never go up against a Sicilian when DEATH is on the line!!

As a self-serving closer, I'm going to use my forum here to promote another. WOCH is finally together and ready to roll. Get ready freshman. That elusive channel 13 on your television set is about to come alive like never before. Watch and listen to the sounds of Nick and Special K taking over your fragile airwaves Saturday nights from 8pm-10pm with "It's Our Bag, Baby." Make it the soundtrack to your weekend.

Letters to the Editor

Staff member's death a tragedy for the University

To the editor:

Together with the entire University community, I was shocked and saddened to learn about the tragic death of Jean Hosmer this past Monday. Jean worked in the Extension Office of Communications and Marketing in Draper Hall.

A part of the Extension family for more than 20 years, she held a very special place in the life of the Extension office. Her friends and colleagues have impressed me with their comments about her energy and enthusiasm, her lunch-hour guitar jam sessions, her love of biking, camping, and contradancing. Obviously, she made a deep impression on many people and she will be sorely missed in many ways.

The tragedy is compounded by the fact that her husband/assailant William Bernotas also worked on campus, in OIT. His colleagues are also devastated.

My deepest condolences go to the family, especially the children Kevin and Sandy, and to all friends and co-workers.

While it will take a long time to come to terms with this sad, sad event, the University community is fortunate to have resources available to help with the shock and grief many are experiencing. Counselors are available at Health Services (545-2337). Fran Deats and others from the Employee Assistance Program have already begun assisting friends and colleagues (545-0350). The Everywoman's Center offers counseling and assistance through a variety of programs and services, including hotline (545-0800). Chaplains and other resources are also available to faculty and staff as well as students through the Dean of Students office (545-2684).

Besides these institutional resources, as a caring community we all need to reach out and support one another on a personal level as we deal with these tragic events.

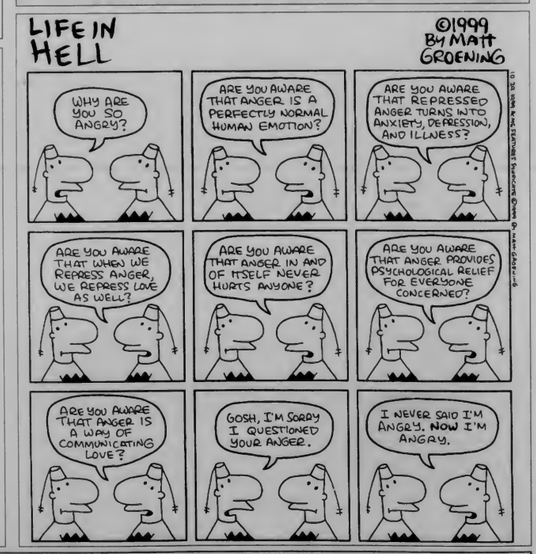
Black Affairs page needs to be restructured

To the editor:

As an avid reader of the Collegian, I am often offended by one thing in almost every issue. This is not problematic for me because I am a journalism major and I realize that a journalist is not doing their job if they don't offend someone. But, this time I could not stop myself from addressing this issue.



Being a member of the bi-racial community in this country I also identify with the African-American population and I am utterly disgusted at the Collegian's handling of its Black Affairs page. I am not a supporter of segregated journalism, i.e. the Black Affairs, GLBT Affairs, or Jewish Affairs pages because of how they isolate the remainder of the community from the experience that these pages are attempting to report about. If issues are truly newsworthy they should be incorporated into the paper as a whole so they are not limited to labels. With that being said, if these pages must exist they should do exist with some dignity.

I often skim through the Black Affairs page because it is often comprised with mindless fillers as it was in the October 25 issue. By the way, congratulations to the staff of the Washington Post who can accurately report on nationwide issues, but where is the input from university students? Why have a page if there are no pertinent articles relating to this campus? Anyway, while perusing the page I noticed its stellar artwork in the upper left and right hand corners. This artwork consists of a stone-faced, angry, black male with a shaven head and dark eyes, raising his two clenched fists in shackles.

This symbol goes beyond feelings of offense, but travels into territories of outrage. If this is supposed to be a page that represents the African-American community of this school, I do not feel this is an appropriate way to do so. This is a terrible depiction of today's black male, who is no longer in shackles and has come a long way from their days of slavery. Would the art department, or whoever picked this great graphic, have placed a swastika or a picture of Holocaust victims on the Jewish Affairs page? Would you put a drag queen on the GLBT Affairs page? I don't think so.

This symbol does not include African-American females and is just another way to isolate people even further. I don't think that anyone, African-American or otherwise, would gleefully turn to a page with a militant and oppressive statement made before you even get to the content of what is written. It seems that the only useful thing about this page was the section that dealt with "This Week in Black History" which was no doubt another thing duplicated from another publication. October 25th's page sums itself up with its quote, "Nothing is said that has not been said before," –Terence 185-159 B.C. This page needs some reworking and re-thinking, that is if any thought went into it in the first place.

Blacks in US politics - Missouri state Senate race heats up early

By Michael Grunwald
Washington Post

BERKELEY, Mo.— It took more than two years for the Senate to take up Ronnie White's nomination to the federal bench. It took less than two hours for the Senate to reject the Missouri Supreme Court judge in a party-line vote, thanks in large part to an impassioned appeal by Sen. John Ashcroft, R-Mo. But it didn't take any time at all for White to become a campaign issue in Missouri, where a hyper-accelerated Senate race between Ashcroft and Gov. Mel Carnahan (D) is making October 1999 feel like November 2000.

Furious black leaders are planning a rally at the courthouse where the Dred Scott slavery case was argued. "Believe me, we're going to send Ashcroft a message," warned the Rev. Willie Ellis of the New Northside Baptist Church. Fired-up Democratic leaders are blasting Ashcroft as a ruthless opportunist. "This was a political drive-by shooting," fumed state Democratic chairman Roy Temple. And the governor has sprung into attack mode.

"What Ashcroft did was a disgrace to the Senate, a real cheap shot," Carnahan said in an interview before a ribbon-cutting in this St. Louis suburb. "Yes, I think it had racial overtones. It certainly did."

So it goes here in the heart of the Permanent Campaign, where the clash of two Missouri power brokers has created a political perpetual motion machine. Carnahan announced his 2000 challenge the day after Election Day 1998. Ashcroft complains that he didn't even wait for the voting machines to cool. And ever since that day including a brief interlude as Ashcroft considered a presidential campaign, before deciding under pressure to tend to his re-election instead these two popular incumbents have been embroiled in one high-profile controversy after another, creating a full-time obsession for the Missouri political establishment, if not for Missouri voters.

In January, Republicans erupted over Carnahan's decision to commute a death sentence for a convicted killer at the request of the pope; Ashcroft soon embarked on a statewide victims' rights tour. Last month, the state legislature overrode Carnahan's veto of a bill banning certain late-term abortions, prompting another flurry of campaign activity. And now the two candidates are sparring over Ashcroft's crusade to block White, a black jurist appointed by Carnahan. Just Friday, after Rep. William "Bill" Clay, D-Mo., called Ashcroft a racist on Fox News, Ashcroft responded in a statement that "today, these smears have gone too far."

Democrats are itching to recapture Congress next year, and Republicans are desperate to maintain control; both sides see Missouri as a key battlefield in the war over the Senate, where the GOP holds a solid but not unbeatable 55 to 45 advantage. So far, the Democratic strategy is clear: portray Carnahan as a moderate, up against an extremist who opposes abortion without exceptions, railroaded an African American judge for political reasons and voted to shut down the government. The GOP script is equally obvious: cast Ashcroft as a conservative, fighting off a liberal who supports abortion on demand, waffled on the death penalty and raised money at a Hollywood fund-raiser that featured Warren Beatty.

That could be the basic playbook for the 2000 campaign all across America. It's just that in Missouri, it's started so early. And it's flaring up so often. "It's a great race to watch two real heavyweights, going after each other hard," said John Hancock, GOP state chairman. "For the political establishment, this race is a 10 on the Richter scale; we think about it all the time," Democrat Temple said. "For normal voters, it's probably more like a one."

This month, the flap over Judge White Judge Not White Enough, some supporters now call him has Ashcroft on the defensive. He rallied his party to shoot down a nomination on the Senate floor for the first time since 1987, describing White as "pro-criminal," accusing him of reversing death sentences more than any other judge on his court. Democrats swiftly produced evidence that White had affirmed death sentences 71 percent of the time, and that four justices Ashcroft appointed when he was governor had voted for more reversals. Even Gentry Trotter, a longtime Ashcroft supporter, resigned from the senator's fund-raising committee, denouncing his "marathon public crucifixion and misinformation campaign."

"John has to be careful: He's getting a reputation as a bigot," said Trotter, a black Republican businessman. In response, Ashcroft has produced lists of minority judges he appointed as governor, of minority judges he voted to confirm as senator, of law enforcement groups that opposed White's nomination. But the subject of race clearly makes him uncomfortable. "I appointed men and women, without regard to ethnicity, or whatever it is you call it," he said in an interview. He said he had no idea the two Missouri groups that opposed White were all-white. Moments later, while discussing White's "minority opinions," he took pains to point out that he was referring to the judge's dissents, not the color of his skin.

"You have to be so careful about this stuff," Ashcroft said with an embarrassed shrug. But he refused to respond to Carnahan's attacks about race. "People in Missouri know what I'm about," he said with a grimace. "They've been very generous to me in the past."

Ashcroft, an energetic politician, was state auditor, attorney general and a two-term governor before sweeping into the Senate with 60 percent of the vote in 1994. Carnahan, son of a former congressman, was a state legislator, state treasurer, and lieutenant governor to Ashcroft before he was elected governor in 1992 and then easily re-elected in 1996. Most early polls give Ashcroft a modest lead, but almost everyone agrees the race will be close.

The polls do suggest that Carnahan alienated some voters when he granted a reprieve to Darrell Mease, a death row inmate who had gunned down a 19-year-old paraplegic and his grandparents. Carnahan said he commuted the sentence out of respect for the pope; he supports the death penalty, and as an aide pointed out, "Mel's been stacking up bodies right and left." But Ashcroft promptly invited the family of Mease's victims to his hearings in Missouri, and Republicans believe the issue will resonate next November.

"I don't usually pay attention to politics until voting time, but believe me, I'm going to remember Carnahan saving that killer," said Stanley Duncan, 70, a retired Boeing supervisor from St. Charles. Carnahan made national news again when his veto of a bill banning what critics call "partial-birth" abortions was overridden by the Democratic-controlled legislature; it was only the third time a veto has been overridden in Missouri this century. A federal judge then suspended the ban as unconstitutional, but Ashcroft aides believe the governor handed them a tailor-made campaign issue. Missouri has always been at the forefront of the anti-abortion movement; when Ashcroft was attorney general, he defended a state parental consent law before the Supreme Court.

The real issue, Carnahan insists, is again moderation versus extremism. Ashcroft, son of a prominent evangelist, is a lead sponsor of a constitutional amendment to ban abortions nationwide. "From a substantive perspective, we're sorry the partial-birth bill passed," said Geoff Garin, Carnahan's pollster. "But from a political perspective, we're delighted to remind everyone that Ashcroft wants to criminalize all abortions."

Carnahan and Ashcroft agree that ultimately, the focus of the race will shift away from social issues such as abortion and the death penalty, toward bread-and-butter issues such as Social Security, Medicare, education and health care. But they also agree that the key themes of these early battles will echo for the duration of the race, and other races all over the country. Democratic, moderate versus extremist, Republican conservative versus liberal.

Complex Shades of Blackness: Inaugural poem

Maya Angelou
January 20 1993

A Rock, A River, A Tree
Hosts to species long since departed,
Marked the mastodon.

The dinosaur, who left dry tokens
Of their sojourn here
On our planet floor,
Any broad alarm of their hastening doom
Is lost in the gloom of dust and ages.

But today, the Rock cries out to us, clearly, forcefully,
Come, you may stand upon my Back and face your distant destiny,
But seek no haven in my shadow.

I will give you no more hiding place down here.

You, created only a little lower than
The angels, have crouched too long in The bruising darkness,
Have lain too long
Face down in ignorance.

Your mouths spilling words
Armed for slaughter.

The Rock cries out today, you may stand on me,
But do not hide your face.

Across the wall of the world,
A River sings a beautiful song.
Come rest here by my side.

Each of you a bordered country,
Delicate and strangely made proud,
Yet thrusting perpetually under siege.

Your armed struggles for profit
Have left collars of waste upon
My shore, currents of debris upon my breast.

Yet, today I call you to my riverside,
If you will study war no more. Come.

Clad in peace and I will sing the songs
The Creator gave to me when I and the Tree and the stone were one.

Before cynicism was a bloody sear across your Brow and when you yet knew you still Knew nothing.

The River sings and sings on.

There is a true yearning to respond to
The singing River and the wise Rock.

So say the Asian, the Hispanic, the Jew
The African and Native American, the Sioux,
The Catholic, the Muslim, the French, the Greek
The Irish, the Rabbi, the Priest, the Sheikh,
The Gay, the Straight, the Preacher,
The privileged, the homeless, the Teacher.
They hear. They all hear
The speaking of the Tree.

Today, the first and last of every Tree
Speaks to humankind. Come to me, here beside the River.

Plant yourself beside me, here beside the River.

Each of you, descendant of some passed
On traveler, has been paid for.

You, who gave me my first name, you
Pawnee, Apache and Seneca, you
Cherokee Nation, who rested with me, then Forced on bloody feet, left me to the employment of

Other seekers–desperate for gain,
Starving for gold.

You, the Turk, the Swede, the German, the Scot ...
You the Ashanti, the Yoruba, the Kru, bought
Sold, stolen, arriving on a nightmare
Praying for a dream.

Here, root yourselves beside me.

I am the Tree planted by the River,
Which will not be moved.

I, the Rock, I the River, I the Tree
I am yours–your Passages have been paid.

Lift up your faces, you have a piercing need
For this bright morning dawning for you.

History, despite its wrenching pain,
Cannot be unlived, and if faced
With courage, need not be lived again.

Lift up your eyes upon
The day breaking for you.

Give birth again
To the dream.

Women, children, men,
Take it into the palms of your hands.

Mold it into the shape of your most Private need. Sculpt it into
The image of your most public self.
Lift up your hearts
Each new hour holds new chances
For new beginnings.

Do not be wedded forever
To fear, yoked eternally
To brutishness.

The horizon leans forward,
Offering you space to place new steps of change.
Here, on the pulse of this fine day
You may have the courage
To look up and out upon me, the Rock, the River, the Tree, your country.

No less to Midas than the mendicant.

No less to you now than the mastodon then.

Here on the pulse of this new day
You may have the grace to look up and out
And into your sister's eyes, into Your brother's face, your country
And say simply Very simply With hope
Good morning

Iggy Pop reincarnated

Avenue B a mellow turn for rocker

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

IGGY POP
Avenue B
Virgin

No, he's not dead.

With the release of his latest album, Avenue B, and a five-city tour (which hits Boston tonight), James Osterberg (better known as Iggy Pop), has once again risen from the ashes of his legendary cult status. His new disc is his first since 1996, a successful year in which Iggy saw the release of the I P Naughty Little Doggie, and the re-issue of the 1977 single "Lust for Life," the latter of which is thanks to the film Trainspotting.

Or maybe you remember Iggy from his early '90s hit "Candy," or possibly his cover of Johnny O'Keefe's "Real Wild Child." It could be his collaboration with David Bowie, producing such hits as "Nightclubbing," "The Passenger" and "China Girl" (written with Bowie and then covered by Bowie himself), that is jogging your memory. Or perhaps you've been a fan of Iggy since his punk rock origins with The Stooges. Whether you're a hardcore fan or have a casual interest in Iggy's work, Avenue B is nothing that you'd expect from the aging icon. I'll get to whether that's good or bad in a minute.

Avenue B is a relatively mellow album in comparison to Iggy's raw, edgy material, and his radio-ready hits as well. Don't expect any of the 13 tracks on the disc to fly up the charts like a phoenix. He is not interested in that here. Rather, Iggy wants to further solidify his credibility as a songwriter – a goal that may seem silly to some, since in the eyes of some fans and critics he can do no wrong. To accomplish this task, the sound of the album is stripped down to be as minimalist as possible. Many of the "songs" sound more like poetry readings— verses uttered in baritone with echo distortion.

The opening track, "No Shit," shows Iggy at a new level of maturity, since that is exactly what he is contemplating: "It was in the winter of my fiftieth year/when it hit me... My home and study meant more to me/As I considered the circumstances of my death." This track segues smoothly into "Nazi Girlfriend," which showcases Iggy's haunting crooning over an acoustic accompaniment.

The title track, "Avenue B" is arguably the best track on the album, rivaled only by the last song, "Facade." Both tunes blend blues, funk, punk and a few other influences to create seamless pieces destined to be lauded among Iggy's best. The rest of the album is hit or miss. A lyric or two of Iggy's spoken-word outings may make you raise an eyebrow, while the rest of them seem uninspired, although never lacking in prosaic beauty.

But if you feel as though you're trapped at open-mic night at Fire & Water, Iggy does take a few breaks to dish out some music. There are a few tracks that are hard rocking, such as a cover of Johnny Kidd and the Pirates' "Shakin' All Over," "Corruption" and "Español," the latter of which is sung (you guessed it) entirely in Spanish. And the Medeski, Martin and Wood collaboration, "I Felt the Luxury" is nothing if not interesting.

Before picking this album up, keep in mind that is an acquired taste. Whether or not it is a taste worth acquiring is something you'll probably decide on the first listen. B

Iggy Pop will be playing tonight at Avalon in Boston. Doors open at 7 p.m. Tickets are available through NEXT ticketing by calling (617) 423-NEXT.

House top haunt at box office

Taye Diggs is doubly as impressive

COURTESY WARNER BROS.

Taye Diggs, seen here in House on Haunted Hill, scored big by appearing in this weekend's two top movies at the box office.

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

Before I run down the weekly box-office totals, I'd like to clarify something, which might be irking some regular readers. Two weeks ago in this column, I reported that Double Jeopardy had topped the box office again with The Story of Us and Fight Club coming in close behind. Well, as it turns out, Fight Club won the weekend with slightly more than $11 million, followed by Double Jeopardy, and then The Story of Us with slightly less than $10 million. Was this an error on my part? Well, no. The numbers that I give are merely studio estimates— albeit very good estimates— they are estimates nonetheless. The actual box office numbers cannot be calculated until after Sunday's totals have been accounted for. So, take the numbers with a grain of salt as they might skew by 1 percent or so.

Now on to the weekend. House on Haunted Hill managed to do something which Bats failed to do last weekend. That is, take advantage of it' Halloween-oriented theme at the box office. The newcomer bested last week's champ, another Taye Diggs movie, The Best Man, with a weekend total of $15.1 million. The film opened on 270 screens for a $5572 per-screen average.

Not surprisingly, cousin of Spike Lee, Malcolm Lee's directorial debut, The Best Man showed strong legs this past weekend, falling only 28 percent from last weekend. That meant $6.5 million this past session and $18.1 overall. If the movie keeps this performance up, Spike will want to ask his kindred for some advice.

Teetering on the brink of $100 million, Double Jeopardy took perhaps the final step before it hits this goal. Its' $5.4 million was good enough for a third place finish and an even more impressive $98.3 million gross to date.

American Beauty continues to do its' best Shakespeare in Love impression, by continually captivating large audiences on relatively few screens. The drop this week was only 25 percent and the weekend total came to $3.9 million, $34.2 million overall. It will be interesting to see if this one actually hits $100 million before it's through.

The only other opener this week was Music of the Heart, starring Meryl Streep and Angela Basset. The heart-warming melodrama, directed by the unlikely Wes Craven, managed to pull in $3.7 million on 1349 screens for a poor per-screen average of $2743.

Despite some pretty good reviews and a fairly bankable star (Nicholas Cage), Bringing out the Dead fell 44 percent from last weekend's total to $3.5 million and sixth place. It stands at $11.6 million right now, which means it might fail to break even $20 million.

In its' third week, The Story of Us made $3 million and has grossed $22.2 million to date. This will likely be its' last week in the top ten.

Three Kings, which is looking more and more like Oscar material, managed to claim the last spot in this week's list with $2.5 million on 1851 screens. It serves as a good example of the economics behind movie releases; that total is a 39 percent drop in screens from when the movie opened five weeks ago.

As for two of last week's openers, Bats lost more than half of its customers, falling an abysmal 51 percent to $2.3 million for the weekend. Its' $8 million gross means it will be available to rent by next Friday. And finally, Three to Tango felt the barrage of scathing reviews, to which I gladly contributed, tumbling 50 percent to $2.2 million. This should be a lesson to all those TV actors looking to bang out a movie while they're not working.

Losing its luster

NBA's image fading as marquee stars age

By Paul Doyle
Hartford Courant

BOSTON - In the post-Magic Johnson-Larry Bird era, Michael Jordan and Charles Barkley were among the biggest names in the NBA. Their personalities transcended their sport, and their celebrity grew beyond basketball.

By the end of this season, if you can believe Barkley, they will both be retired. As the NBA starts Year 2 of the post-Jordan era, Barkley has announced- yet again- this will be his final season.

But the transition has just started. Other stars from the Barkley-Jordan generation may soon be fading: Karl Malone is 36, David Robinson 34, Hakeem Olajuwon 36, Scottie Pippen 34, Patrick Ewing 37.

"Once these guys all retire and they're gone, it'll hurt the NBA," Bird said. "But it seems like there's always someone to step in and take their place."

That process has already begun. Spurs forward Tim Duncan is the preseason favorite for MVP, while 76ers guard Allen Iverson has a scoring title on his resume. And Lakers swingman Kobe Bryant could be the most marketable player in the league.

But no matter how exciting Duncan, Iverson, Bryant, Timberwolves forward Kevin Garnett or Pistons forward Grant Hill are on the court, the health of the NBA may be more tied to their conduct off it. In the wake of last year's labor dispute- which came on the heels of Jordan's retirement- players have been instructed to sign more autographs, interact with fans and simply smile more often.

Before the Celtics-Wizards game Thursday in Springfield, Pervis Ellison thanked fans for attending the game when he addressed the crowd.

Expect the same sort of groveling all over the league.

"I think there's a bit of an identity crisis going on right now, perhaps, in the NBA," Lakers Coach Phil Jackson said. "But I think that they're addressing the problem ... with a much more player-friendly orientation."

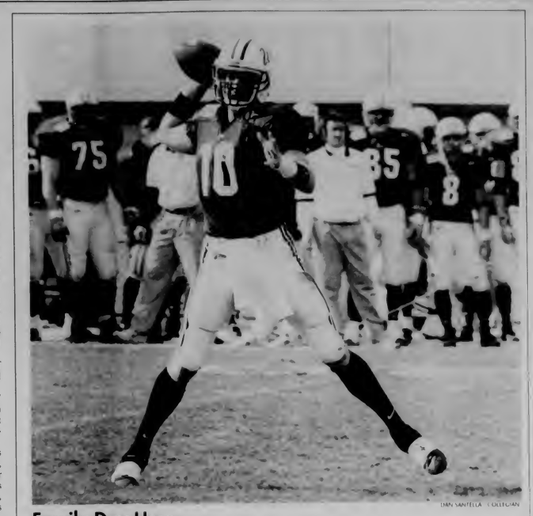
As the season begins Tuesday, the top five or six teams may be in the Western Conference. Besides the defending champions Spurs, the conference includes title favorites such as the Lakers, Trail Blazers, Jazz and Rockets.

The Suns have Penny Hardaway teamed with Jason Kidd for the best backcourt in the league, but they may struggle to break into the elite of the conference. If they played in the East, Phoenix might be the conference favorite.

"The West is top-heavy," Warriors Coach P.J. Carlesimo said. "But the real problem is when you get down to spots seven, eight, nine and 10. Those last couple of playoff spots will be real hard to come by."

That also could result in playoff upsets, because the bottom seeds will be dangerous.

"There are a lot of great teams," San Antonio coach Gregg Popovich said. "I think the team that comes out of the West will be a pretty well-tested group."



When Jackson stacks his Lakers against other contenders in the West, he sees one matchup problem: power forward. In a conference that includes such rebounding forwards as Duncan, Garnett, Malone, Sacramento's Chris Webber, Phoenix's Tom Gugliotta and Seattle's Vin Baker, the Lakers counter with A.C. Green, 36. And Green's backup is Travis Knight.

So where are Jackson's rebounding fantasies taking him? Probably the Las Vegas strip.

"I've heard from Dennis (Rodman)," Jackson said. "I've yet to have person-to-person contact with him, but indeed I have (heard from him)."

Jackson tried and failed to land Pippen before adding Bulls castoff Ron Harper. So in his effort to perhaps recapture the magic he found in Chicago, Jackson is considering the best available former Bull.

Rodman could fill a valuable role for Jackson. But Rodman was a disaster in a 23-game stint for the Lakers last season, and Jackson knows better than anyone that his baggage is daunting— which is why he is treading lightly.

While the Rhode Island defense focused on containing tailback Marcel Shipp, quarterback Todd Bankhead went to work airing it out in Saturday's 31-9 UMass win.

to," UMass senior Cindy Garceau said.

On Friday afternoon UMass squeezed out a 1-0 win over Duquesne. Garceau scored off a corner kick with 18:07 left to play in the first half, and the Minutewomen held on from there. The goal was Garceau's sixth of the year, and fourth off a corner kick.

Kara Green added an assist on the goal by Garceau.

"I don't know why other teams still overlook me [during corner kicks] because I've got six goals. They go and mark Robin [Smith], and that leaves me wide open," Garceau said.

The defensive unit put together a solid cohesive effort in helping the Minutewomen to the shutout. Sophomore Cori Stevens made seven saves in goal to earn the shutout.

"They [Duquesne] didn't have many opportunities, but the ones they did have I was able to stop," Stevens said. "Being our second-to-last game of the year, our defense has more and more experience playing together. They're playing a lot better with each other now."

The rest of the Atlantic 10 tournament will be comprised of Dayton, Xavier and St. Bonaventure. The semifinal games will take place on Friday afternoon at 12 p.m. and 2:30 p.m. The championship game will be Sunday at noon.

Award candidate Shipp would end with 48 yards on the ground, ending his 100-yard rushing streak at 19 games, while Ram leading back David Iamison would finish with 42.

"We did a pretty good job against (Shipp). But I don't know what they threw[for back there but it was a lot of real estate," Rhode Island coach Floyd Keith said.

While Shipp struggled, Bankhead thrived, as he passed the Minutemen downfield on the subsequent possession, finally hitting wideout Jimmie Howard for a 21 yard strike to push the UMass lead up to 14-3.

"We did what we had to do and we really concentrated on the first half during the week," Massachusetts skipper Mark Whipple said. "And staked a big lead."

Between Ram punts, forced by the stellar play of Minutemen defenders such as linebacker Kole Ayi, who registered 14 tackles and two sacks, and safety Brian Smith, who tallied eight tackles and an interception, the UMass offense moved the pigskin with ease.

"They're certainly the best football team we've played, without a doubt," Keith said. "And I think they're playing extremely well. You can't spot a team like that 20-something points in the first half and try to play catch-up. I'm very impressed with the job they did defensively, and I think they did a good job utilizing the play-action passes. Shoot, I saw guys down there who weren't even close to them."

Shipp, while being controlled statistically, managed to get his 15th touchdown of the year later in the half to finish off a 6-play, 83-yard possession that chewed up a mere 2:03 off the clock.

Rhode Island would finally reach the end zone when Mastrole hit receiver Matt Birkett for a nine-yard touchdown with 7:40 to go in the game. Szczesniak hit the right upright to hold the Rams to nine points on the afternoon.

Minuteman kicker Jason Cherry's field goal on the first UMass drive of the second half finished their scoring off at 31.

the men's soccer single season scoring record. He is one behind Randy Jacobs who recorded 17 for UMass in 1992.

Unfortunately, Black was not able to reach number one, as the Minutemen were shut out by St. Bonaventure 1-0 yesterday. Unlike their television counterparts, who had the handy ability to turn ordinary products into weapons, the Minutemen could not manufacture a win without any offensive material to help them, and snapped a four game winning streak. They eventually succumbed to the Bonnies in the closing minutes, as the game-ending goal was fired past senior goalie and captain Todd Fowler, who, despite getting the loss, recorded a career-high 10 saves on the day.

Although they ended the season with a loss, the tournament-bound Minutemen will not be hanging up their cleats any time soon. They will start preparing for this weekend, when they will head to Dayton, Ohio to begin their post-season play on Friday. UMass will take the field against an opponent that has yet to be announced. Possible contenders for the A-10 championship this year are UMass, L.R.I, Duquesne and St. Bonaventure. If everything goes well, the Minutemen will be the ones enjoying a cigar with Hannibal at the end of the weekend.

Shipp drew the defense left while Adrian Zullo took the end-around 49 yards down the right sideline untouched.

"Their safeties were always walking down to take away the run so it left a lot of one-on-ones," Whipple said. "They were really intent on walking those guys down and putting nine in the box and taking away No. 5 [Shipp] and that left one-on-one coverage on the outside."

Of Shipp's 15 carries in the first half, 11 were stopped at or short of the line of scrimmage. At one point, he'd been stopped for no gain or a loss on five consecutive carries.

"I don't think our O-line showed up. I told them that. I think each one of them should apologize to Marcel Shipp because he's made them look good for a few games. They just didn't show up. They passed [protected] all right, but [passed] it was just a real hard game to coach."

It was one or the other for Keith, like forcing down that last spoonful of peas, knowing that dessert awaits. Only this time, there was no dessert.

So was stopping Shipp altogether worth it?

By halftime, Keith had discovered that his plan had backfired. His Rams were down 28-3 and his secondary had been picked apart, yielding 261 passing yards through two quarters. In the second half, URI came at Bankhead, holding him to just 59 yards passing. Shipp, on the other hand, ran for 42 yards on just eight carries.

Shipp would get his touchdown, a 1-yard score midway through the second quarter, running his consecutive game streak in that category to five. Otherwise, it was a long afternoon for the Paterson, N.J native.

Luckily for the Minutemen, a senior co-captain manned the wheel to keep the boat from rocking.

Minutemen send A-10 foe Rhode Island packing

Rams put clamps on Shipp, but can't move ball on UM

Maroon and White ground threat keeps Rhody honest

On the lazy day before Halloween, it almost seemed like the Rhode Island Rams had overlooked their football game with Massachusetts in anticipation of The Great Pumpkin.

Ironically enough, they had to wait just about as long to pick up their first down. As the clock struck 10:02 to go in the second quarter, the visiting Rams finally advanced past ten yards to pick up a new set of downs.

UMass (5-3, 5-1 in the Atlantic 10) toppled Rhody (1-7, 1-4) by a score of 31-9 with a stifling defensive performance to win their fourth consecutive game.

Still, it was the visitors who put points on the board initially, as two Minuteman opportunities were squandered in the opening frame with turnovers.

On the first Massachusetts possession of the game, an overhand lateral from signal caller Todd Bankhead to tailback Marcel Shipp fell to the ground and was scooped up by Rhode Island's Marc Hayes, who took the fumble from the UMass 45 yard line to the 11. Ram quarterback Ken Mastrole, one of two baby blue field generals to see significant playing time, could only govern his squad downfield eight yards, and Rhody was forced to send in Ryan Szczesniak to boot a 26-yard field goal and give the Rams a 3-0 advantage.

In the next trip down the field for the Minutemen, Bankhead spiraled the ball to receiver Eric Bross, who, while crossing the goal line, fumbled into the end zone. Rhode Island linebacker Paul Picciotti recovered the ball, and the Rams set up shop on the 20.

That was where their luck would end, though, as Massachusetts would score on their next three possessions while holding Rhode Island to three points.

The next immediate UMass drive consisted of sophomore sparkplug Adrian Zullo doing what he does best – sprinting downfield with opposite- colored jerseys falling to the turf behind him. Him the 5-foot-7, 151-pounder took a reverse around the right end and blazed 49 yards down the sideline into the end zone to finish a one-play drive and, in one snap, pick up more yards than anyone else in the game would.

It's okay, Marcel. We forgive you.

After 19 consecutive games of hitting the century mark, Marcel Shipp finally slowed down. At last, the news broke that Shipp had a human side to his otherworldly knack for running the football. Through a quarter, he had zero yards on eight carries. At the half – 15 carries, four yards.

The Rams came in to stop the junior tailback from trampling its defense like he had to so many before. At any moment, URI coach Floyd Keith loaded the line of scrimmage with eight or nine defenders in hopes of halting Shipp's romp.

As the game progressed, the prospect of Mr. Reliability continuing his streak slowly trickled down the drain.

Along with it went the Rhode Island Rams.

So, for once, the Massachusetts football team (5-3 overall, 5-1 Atlantic 10) gave Shipp the day off. Forget 44 carries against Delaware. The Minutemen didn't need a second touchdown, or a third or fourth, for that matter. The day called for others to shine and quarterback Todd Bankhead stepped across the line, putting forth possibly the best performance of the 1999 season.

The senior co-captain has battled a fractured wrist on his non-throwing hand since early on against Villanova. With much of his arsenal gone from last year's aerial assault, the Minuteman offense had holes to fill and Bankhead had to ante up without knowing what cards he held.

On Saturday, without last year's troops gone, the offense turned the corner. After four 300-yard passing days last season, Bankhead went 16-for-27 for 322 yards and two touchdowns, his first 300-yard game this season.

"With them gearing everything towards Marcel, we got to be able to throw the ball and we did a better job of that today," Bankhead said.

Saturday marked the reintroduction of the deep ball to the huddle. Dense trenches left green pastures unguarded in the defensive backfield. It was evident from the beginning that stopping Shipp would be URI's top priority on defense. After dropping Shipp for a three-yard loss on 2nd-and-10 at the URI 40, Bankhead found a wide-open Eric Bross on the right seam before Bross fumbled at the 1. On their next drive,

UMass hockey gets on board

Blanchard goal nets win

Thanks to Jeff Blanchard's goal 4:15 into overtime, the Massachusetts hockey team earned its first win of the season Friday night against Army.

The play started off a feed from junior Jeff Turner, who found Blanchard in the Army zone. Blanchard then circled the Cadets cage and fired a shot past Corey Winer for the game-winning goal. The score was the second of the season for the Stouffville, Ontario product.

UMass (1-3, 0-2 in Hockey East) dominated the Cadets for the full 64-plus minutes. The Minutemen outshot Army 56-19, but couldn't put one past Winer until late in the overtime period.

While Winer made 55 saves in the hard-luck loss, UMass goalie Markus Helanen made 19 stops in the winning effort.

The Minutemen will next be in action on Friday night when they return back to Hockey East action to face UMass-Lowell. Following that tilt, they will head to Durham, N.H. on Saturday night to face New Hampshire. Game time is set for 7 p.m. on both nights.

Field hockey gets by NU Huskies to finish with seven-game streak

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Even an ugly win feels good. Especially when it spells a pretty ending to a beautiful season.

The Massachusetts field hockey team (11-8, 5-0 Atlantic 10) overcame a no-so showing at Northeastern yesterday to escape with its seventh victory in a row by a score of 2-0. Minutewomen Anke Bruemmer and Chrissy Millbauer each found the net for the Maroon and White, while goalkeeper Zowie Tucker recorded four saves in her fourth solo shutout of the season.

"We did not play well at all," said UM coach Patty Shea, who ran her career mark at the UMass helm to 38-26 with the victory. "But we were still able to come away with the win, so we have to be happy."

The Minutewomen came into the season finale on the highest of highs, having already wrapped up the A-10 regular season title and the top seed in this upcoming weekend's conference tournament. The Huskies (7-11, 6-2 America East) had gained some momentum with a 2-1 win over Vermont on Wednesday, after dropping a 3-2 overtime heartbreaker to No. 14 Boston University last weekend.

UMass got off to a sluggish start in the Halloween rumble, something Shea chalked up to both a difficult playing surface and a lackluster offensive effort from her troops.

"We came out sluggish. We didn't attack like we usually do," Shea said. "But the field was a very difficult one to play on. It was Astroturf, but it was really, really sticky, so the balls tended to bounce a lot."

Things bounced the Minutewomen's way at the 10:24 mark of the first half, when a UMass penalty corner gave Bruemmer and company a chance to get on the board. The German back had her first shot on the play blocked by the Husky defense, but followed up with a second effort that got by NU keeper Emily Roy.

The goal was Bruemmer's 15th of the season, giving the sophomore 27 scores in her collegiate career. She also wrapped up the A-10 scoring title in the process.

Despite being kept off the board through the first 35 minutes of play, the Huskies actually enjoyed a 7-2 shot advantage through the first half. Shea credits quality defensive play from a trio of Minutewomen as the edge that kept UM on top.

"Defensively, we had to weather some storms," Shea said. "Kerry Ann Jaggarsar, Jill Fantasia and Lucy Koch all played well for us. They're the meat of our backfield, and they really stepped up and did a great job."

The Maroon and White's 1-0 lead would last through halftime and much of the second set, until standout senior Chrissy Millbauer added an insurance score with 8:17 remaining. It was the Connecticut native's fourth goal of the season, giving her 10 career goals through four solid seasons in maroon and white.

"Chrissy is a great attacking player," Shea said. "She did what she's supposed to do: She took the ball, went hard on an angle, and forced the goalkeeper to make a play."

The UM defense took over from there, holding Northeastern without a shot on goal for the entire second half.

The Minutewomen return to action this Friday, when they battle host St. Joseph's in the first round of the Bell Atlantic 10 Tournament. Game time is slotted for 1 pm.

The winner of that matchup will face the winner of the Temple / Rhode Island game, which also takes place on Friday. The title game is scheduled for Saturday.

"We definately have some momentum, coming off of this win." Shea said.

Minutewomen handle Rams, bow to Bonnies in A-10 action

DAN SANTELLA / COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Kristi Robicheau has paid big dividends for the Minutewomen's offense all year from the forward position.

By Michael Kobylanski

Following a weekend in which the Massachusetts women's soccer team split its final two regular season games against Duquesne and St. Bonaventure, there is one primary question that confronts the Minutewomen heading into this weekend's Atlantic 10 conference tournament.

Can UMass rebound from yesterday's tough 1-0 loss to the SBU and steer its ship back on the right course before Friday's A-10 semifinal match-up with Xavier?

The good news for the Minutewomen is that they have the next four days to try and find the answer.

"This is was the most disappointing weekend that we've had since I've been here," UMass women's soccer coach Jim Rudy said. "If we're strong enough, then we'll bounce back from it, but we can't play like this next weekend and expect to do anything in the tournament."

Yesterday afternoon at Totman Field, the Bonnies used a first-half goal by Kelly Nagy to take a 1-0 lead. Then they hung on by the skin of their teeth in the second half to come away with the win and their first ever trip to the A-10 tournament.

UMass (11-4-1, 9-2 Atlantic 10) had a host of chances in the final 45 minutes to net the equalizer. For most of that time the ball was deep in the St. Bonaventure end, but the Minutewomen came away with nothing to show for it.

The best chance for UMass came with about 25 minutes to go when senior captain Robin Smith headed a corner kick off the crossbar. The ball had SBU keeper Karen Cunningham beat, but hit nothing but iron as it went past her.

"We can turn this [loss] into a positive. Next time we play them they're not going to have a chance if we play the way that we know how

Minutemen come with their "A" game to Duquesne, fall to SBU

By Matt Crocker
Collegian Staff

Pity the fools who have to play the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team next weekend in the Atlantic 10 tournament, because when it has a plan that falls together, you have to be crazier than Murdock to take the field against the Minutemen.

However, this past weekend the University's "A" team only managed a split in a pair of road games. After boarding their jet black van with the red racing stripe, the Minutemen ran down second place conference foe Duquesne, but encountered a problem bigger than B.A.'s fear of flying in St. Bonaventure and dropped their final game of the season to the Bonnies.

Yet, before the final whistle blew yesterday to end the regular season for the Maroon and White, the Minutemen picked up their 12th win of the season against Duquesne. UMass' victory sent a warning to Duquesne, one of the four teams that they might meet in the A-10 tournament. The Dukes have never beaten UM and, failing once again, lost 2-0.

Senior midfielder Todd Baron and senior forward Adam Black both scored in the victory. Opening up the day's scoring, Baron found the net almost nine minutes into the second half. Baron's goal was the first all season to be scored by an Atlantic 10 player at Duquesne's Rooney Field. Whether it was the artificial turf or spectacular defense, the Dukes had quieted all A-10 offense in their hometown until Baron was left open in the second half.

Following Baron's lead, Black netted his 16th goal of the season of an assist from senior midfielder James Redmond in the closing minutes of the game, giving the Minutemen a little breathing room as time ran out for the Dukes. Black's goal moved him to second on

Amherst allocates funding

Golf course grant discussed in meeting

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

Amherst – The town of Amherst held the Fall 1999 Special Town Meeting last night. The agenda consisted of several articles requesting that the town allocate funding to various outlets.

The main concern of the evening revolved around the town meeting's vote to invest $286,000 in capital improvements to the Cherry Hill Golf course. After some discussion, a two/thirds majority voted to pass the article, which will spend $186,000 to install an irrigation system in the course's fairways. In a second vote, the town meeting also voted to replace the current condemned clubhouse with a newly built one at the cost of $100,000.

The town-owned golf course, which before the vote last night would have been forced to look into closing down, was endorsed by the Board of Selectman, Finance Committee and Joint Capital Planning Committee, although a town meeting member, Larry Kelley had begun a campaign against the course.

"As the condemned clubhouse starkly illustrates, Cherry Hill has a track record of missed projections, corner cutting and neglect," Kelley remarked in a statement handed out at the meeting. "$286,000 is too much to waste, too little to help, and way, way, too late." He wanted the course to be instead converted into soccer fields, which he says is more appropriate for the site.

Others argued that golf was a growing sport in the area for not only the elder, but for young people as well and that the golf course needed the additional money to remain running successfully. John Coull, executive director, Amherst area Chamber of Commerce said, "It will provide the opportunity for the Town to take advantage of a growing market."

Many of the other motions of the meeting carried without debate, as articles to pay debt service and late bills from the previous fiscal year were passed.

The gathered voters carried the motion to authorize the select board to take the appropriate measures towards the installation of a sewer line and provide temporary access for construction of the Boltwood Walk parking garage. Although the installation of such a line was not necessary to complete the parking garage, Finance Committee felt it was a more cost efficient way to approach the issue. The supporters of the motion believe it will make the work on the garage easier if the line has already been finished.

Other business included an approved $131,902 towards the design development phase of the expansion and renovation of the Crocker Farm Elementary School. Some of the planned renovations will be to expand the current space, in addition to building a new preschool area. The playground area, parking, lighting, electrical, heating/ventilating, and energy efficiency systems will also be upgraded.

The town meeting also passed a motion to raise and appropriate $250,000 to repair the roof of the Town Hall. It was said that these new renovations should hold up for at least the next 25 years.

Meningitis case second diagnosis in fall semester

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

A 19-year-old student at the University of Massachusetts has been diagnosed with bacterial meningitis. The female student from West Newton is being housed in Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton.

On Sunday, the student came to University Health Services saying that she felt ill. She was started on antibiotics immediately. UMass does not release the names of the sick.

Meningitis is an inflammation of the linings of the brain and spinal cord. It can be caused by viruses or bacteria.

Friends and family of the stricken student have been treated. This student's illness is the second case of bacterial meningitis at UMass this year. The first student, who got sick in September, was hospitalized in the South Shore Hospital in South Weymouth.

At that time, UMass Public Health Nurse A.J. Lardner warned that anyone could get meningitis if saliva was shared between individuals. She warned that students who smoked the same cigarette, used the same toothbrush, kissed, drank from the same glass or did anything else that could result in saliva being exchanged with someone with meningitis were at risk for developing meningitis.

Common symptoms of meningitis include a stiff neck, headaches and a high temperature. Individuals may also have a hard time waking up, may be confused or might be extremely tired.

Students who are diagnosed with meningitis are treated in a hospital, while students who have been in contact with those who are sick are treated with 500 milligrams of Ciprofloxacin. After the last student became ill, Lardner tracked down friends of the sick individual for treatment.

Lardner said that there were no side effects to the treatment, but did add that other treatments were available to students who might be allergic to Ciprofloxacin.

Meningitis has been seen on campus prior to this semeseter.

Last May, a student was diagnosed and then hospitalized umil June. In 1997, Todd Hendsbee, 21, a former UMass student who was taking a semester off, died after contracting a strain of meningitis that infected his blood.

Majors fair showcases opportunities for study at UM

The annual majors fair held at the University of Massachusetts will take place tomorrow in the Student Union Ballroom at 6 p.m.

The event, which is sponsored by both the Commonwealth College and Pre-Major Advising, will allow students the opportunity to speak with representatives from over 70 different majors. According to Susan Machala, an academic advisor with the Undergraduate Advising and Academic Support Center (UAASC), this informal gathering is one of the largest that takes place all year, and enables students to take the first step towards contacting representatives for their various majors. Malacha explained that this majors' fair will have one of the largest turnouts for various majors in the history of the event. Representatives from majors ranging from anthropology to women's studies will be on hand to answer any student questions.

The fair is "an easy way for students to find out more information without feeling foolish," Machala said.

Although the event is geared towards underclassmen searching for information about the campus, this event could also be helpful for upperclassmen. Both undeclared students and students who already have a major may also benefit from the program, according to Machala. She explained that some students are interested in changing majors, looking at minors or exploring the career opportunities that exist within a particular field of study. Machala said this fair was important for students who are "not aware of resources at UMass."

"Students see a lot of information about programs that they did not know existed," Machala said.

Cory Pols, assistant director for advising for the Commonwealth College, agreed, saying the majors fair "helps students take things that they are not studying" and find out more information about them.

During the event, faculty advisors from each major will be available to answer student questions. They will also be passing out information on the opportunities in and requirements for their fields. In addition, representatives from the Commonwealth College Campus Career Network and Pre-Major Advising will also be available for student information. Machala said this type of informal system "enables students to see that the faculty is approachable."

The timing for the event may also prove to be a benefit for students interested in attending. Since pre-registration is taking place Nov. 10 through 23, students can choose classes according to information that they receive from the fair.

"Sometimes declaring a major can help students to get into classes that they want," Pols said

She added that the fair might also help am students unsure about their academic future to gain more direction and information.

The Campus Career Network will provide refreshments for the event, and the event is open to all UMass students.

Pedestrian safety laws enforced; O'Connor teaches driver safety

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Imagine that you are heading home from work one evening and returning to your dorm at the University of Massachusetts. It's foggy outside and drizzling and you're driving on University Drive at 30 miles per hour. You approach an intersection by the stadium and suddenly, you realize there are two students in the middle of a crosswalk. You attempt to slam on the brakes to avoid them, but in this flash of a second, you're life has just been drastically changed forever.

This is the scenario that UMass Deputy Chief of police Barbara O'Connor said happened to a student about six or seven years ago. The driver struck two students in the crosswalk, traveling about 30 m.p.h. O'Connor said one of the girls who was struck was forced against the windshield and then thrown over the top and onto the back of the car before being slammed against the pavement. The other girl was carried more than 10 feet on the front hood before being thrown in front of the car and slammed against the pavement.

O'Connor can vividly remember having responded to the event, and still has feelings and images about the accident going through her mind.

"Here you are, you think you're an average student coming home one Sunday night and then, bam...you just caused this tragedy," O'Connor said. "You can imagine how you're feeling at that moment; the intense panic and fear as you're trying to come to grips with what happened."

O'Connor said the most difficult part in dealing with such an event is the "grief notification." She said she has to personally inform the parents of an accident victim that their son or daughter is dead.

"So many people's lives are forever changed as a result of that one moment in time," O'Connor said. "Only if I had been going slower,' you'll tell yourself, 'only if I had been paying more attention.'"

UM duo trace hormone

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Scientists have known for nearly two decades that there are structural and neurobiological differences between the brains of males and females, but a recent discovery at the University of Massachusetts may have linked one region of the male brain that controls hormone development to a surprising source: mothers.

The study, conducted by graduate student Princy Quadros and Assistant Psychology Professor Christine Wagner, was presented earlier this week at the meeting of the Society for Neuroscience in Miami.

The maternal hormone progesterone, which is present in high levels during pregnancy, may be the link to creating those neurological differences. It was previously believed that fetal hormones played this role.

When Wagner and her scientists conducted laboratory experiments on rats, they discovered that male rats brains have more progesterone receptors than female brains. These receptors are specialized to bind only to progesterone. When progesterone binds to these receptors, they act as transcription factors in altering the expression of genes in certain cells.

"Our conclusion was that progesterone in the mother's system could not only enter the fetal brain but could bind to receptors in the fetal brain," Wagner said.

However, critics are opposed to the idea that such hormonal differences in rats can be compared to humans, but Wagner suggests similarities in the findings.

"The sex differences in the brains of rats seem to parallel those found in humans," Wagner said. "Therefore, this finding may offer us a window into the fetal development of human brains."

Such sex differences in rodents brains has Wagner believing that the progesterone affects the way the rats behave and thus may be the leading factor in determining male behavior.

"Gender differences in the brain [of humans] may have something to do with gender differences and behavior but it is impossible to separate that from societal influences," Wagner said.

Unlike humans, in the laboratory she and her scientists can control the environment of the rats and any differences they observe in behavior can only be a result of the hormone levels.

However, Wagner said this is still not clear. They only know that progesterone binds to receptors on the male fetal brains. However, further studies have proven that the progesterone binds to only one particular region of the fetal brain. In male adult rats, this same region of the brain defines male reproductive and parental behavior.

Still, she comments that such assumptions do not provide any evidence to confirm this.

"In rodents, we think these sex differences have something to do with the way they act so we know it has something to do with behavior, at least with rats," Wagner said.

Considering the influences the surrounding environment plays in affecting the behavior of humans, there isn't enough data to confirm the belief that progesterone affects the region of the brain determining male behavior.

As much as she hopes to someday prove this, Wagner said the discovery of the maternal progesterone binding to the male fetal brain is a beginning step to answering this question.

"There are sex differences in the male and female brains," Wagner said. "We don't know the function of these sex differences, but we know they exist."

■ safety

Holding a radar gun in her hand, O'Connor enforced and educated drivers on the importance of obeying pedestrian safety laws yesterday. She said there have been four pedestrian incidents around the area over the last year.

Until last November, when Kerry Hines, 25, of Randolph, died after being struck on Infirmary Way, there hadn't been any report of pedestrian death in the past history of UMass, O'Connor said.

In March, Allison Lustig, 19, of Shrewsbury, died as a result of critical injury sustained after being struck by a car on Commonwealth Avenue. On Sept. 24, Smith College graduate student Tina Haafke, 23, of Germany, was hit and killed in a crosswalk. Ruth Abrams, an assistant professor of Judaic studies at UMass, was struck by a car last month. Abrams was released from Baystate Medical Center only a little more than a week ago.

According to O'Connor, the police can enforce speed and pedestrian laws, but the solution will not be solved unless the community takes a proactive stance on preventing such accidents from occurring.

Colleges give advantage to rich

By Jay Mathews
Washington Post

University of Virginia applicants whose parents are rich enough to make a substantial donation to the school sometimes have an advantage in admissions, U-Va. officials acknowledged last week, after the student newspaper published documents showing how the university tracks such candidates.

The school's development office, which is in charge of fund raising, keeps a list of such applicants and gives their parents a rating of "A," "B" or "C" depending on the size of the gift they might make. The "A" rating goes to parents who have the potential to donate at least $10 million, the "C" rating to those able to give at least $1 million.

University officials said the admissions office does not see such ratings. But the names on the list are discussed at an annual meeting between the head of admissions and a representative from the U-Va. President's office, and in a few cases, an applicant's chances are improved, school officials said.

"I always want to know what this potential donation will mean to U-Va. and how will it benefit our students," said John A. Blackburn, the school's dean of admissions. He said that if the possible gift would strengthen the university in the future, "there are a few cases where I will actually change the decision."

The university never admits a student on the condition that the parents make a donation, Blackburn said.

Admissions officers at several other selective colleges said they, too, occasionally give preference to an applicant from a wealthy and generous family if they are convinced that the student is academically qualified. Officials often refer to such cases as "VIP admits."

But Thomas Lifka, assistant vice chancellor for student academic services at the University of California at Los Angeles, said the board of regents of the University of California system banned VIP admissions, except with special faculty approval, after it ended race-based preferences in admissions decisions.

The idea, Lifka said, was to show that the regents were taking a stand against favoritism of all kinds.

undergraduate admissions at the University of Maryland, said his office gets word of applicants from wealthy and prominent families and keeps track of them. But the school's policy is not to give those applicants preference in admission, he said.

"I am not saying it has not happened or never happened, but it is not something we practice," Seabreeze said. He said the tracking allows the university to warn prominent donors if the applicant they recommended is going to be rejected.

U-Va. spokeswoman Louise Dudley said the school last year tracked 92 applicants whose families might make substantial gifts to the school. Twenty of those, or 22 percent, were accepted. Blackburn said he did not know how many of those 20 students might otherwise have been rejected. U-Va.'s overall acceptance rate last year was 34 percent.

The U-Va. president's office also keeps a list of applicants who were recommended by elected officials or friends of the university. Of the 412 applicants singled out last year because of wealth or important connections, 47 percent were offered admission, Dudley said.

Israel explores its dark and violent history

By Lee Hockstader
Washington Post

KAFR KASSEM, Israel – Even now, the stories are told and retold in the village – from grandfathers to grandsons, from aunts to nieces – and they are harrowing.

They describe the 9-year-old girl, shot 28 times by Israeli soldiers. The 11-year-old boy, a bullet wound in his chest, dying in his grandfather's arms. The truckload of workmen ordered off their vehicle and mowed down where they stood, execution-style.

That evening in 1956, Israeli troops killed 49 peaceable residents, half of them women and children, here in this village about 10 miles east of Tel Aviv. All were Arabs and all were full Israeli citizens, headed home at dusk from work in fields and factories – unaware that a military curfew prohibiting movement after sundown had been imposed an hour or so earlier.

Israel has never apologized officially for the massacre, which occurred amid Arab-Jewish tensions on the eve of the 1956 Sinai war. But this year, Israel took a step toward coming to terms with it. On Friday, the 43rd anniversary, Israeli civics teachers were instructed to lead a one-hour discussion on Kafr Kassem in their classes.

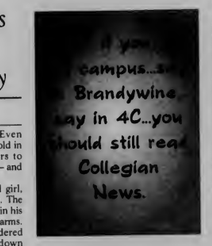
"We would like to tell students our history as it was," said Education Minister Yossi Sarid, who issued the directive. "We have nothing to be ashamed of, and we are very proud of the Zionist accomplishments. Nevertheless, we made mistakes, and sometimes it was not too beautiful and sometimes you can notice various defects in the Zionist efforts."

Sarid's decision fits a growing move in Israeli schools to shine a light on some dark pages in Israel's past and to challenge long-cherished myths of the state's founding and early history. The new teachings explode some of the most basic assumptions Israelis have about their state.

New ninth-grade history books point out for the first time that some Palestinians left their land and became refugees during the 1948 war of independence because they were expelled by Israelis or feared for their lives if they stayed. And the books debunk the widely held view that Israel's victory against five Arab states was an astonishing triumph by an outgunned underdog.

To many Israelis, and to the historians who have written the new textbooks, the teachings replace myths with facts. Facing the truth about the past is a sign of Israel's strength, they say.

"Just like the Americans have to come to grips with what happened with the Indians and to the blacks, we have to come to grips with what has been terrible and wrong in our history too," said Aviezer Ravitsky, professor of Jewish philosophy at Hebrew University in Jerusalem.



The new approach has sparked controversy among politicians, scholars and working Israelis. In general, the argument runs parallel to the broader debate here between Israelis ready to compromise on land and other issues with the Palestinians, and those who fear such compromises imperil Israel's existence.

Many younger Israelis view the country's early days with more detachment than their parents and believe Israel, militarily stronger and more developed than its Arab neighbors, is mature enough to sift through the good and bad in its past.

But some remain viscerally opposed to reexamining the formative myths. For them, Israel's founding and building was a morally pure chapter, and other views are unwelcome. Sarid and some authors of the new textbooks have received venomous and threatening letters and e-mails.

"These new historians want to show that Israel was wrong in every step it took," said Gideon Ezra, 62, a conservative member of the Knesset, Israel's parliament. "They would like to show that all the wars we had with the Arabs are because of the Israelis and not because of the Arabs. People don't remember the 1948 war, the 1956 war, the 1967 war, the 1973 war."

"It's just more groveling to the Arabs," said Jerusalem electrician Eran Cohen, 39. "I don't think we should teach [Kafr Kassem]. The people who committed the crime were punished. OK, some soldiers went too far, but the times were different."

Top court to rule on fees

By David G. Savage
Los Angeles Times

MADISON, Wis. – College campuses are a haven for free speech, and nowhere more so than at the University of Wisconsin.

Students can join myriad groups, and the traditionally liberal campus even has two independent student newspapers, including one with a conservative bent.

While many revel in this marketplace of ideas, some young conservatives say that campus activism is less a tribute to free speech than to a bureaucratic system of "fee speech." Many of the campus activist groups are funded through mandatory student fees.

Now the future of the fee-speech system – a feature of most university campuses today – is in doubt, thanks to a free-speech challenge coming before the Supreme Court this month.

Scott Southworth, a UW law student who believes that students should have the right to "opt out" of funding groups and causes they oppose, argues that mandatory fees are unconstitutional.

He predicts that the Supreme Court will agree and force student groups nationwide to rely on voluntary support.

At UW, about two-thirds of the annual fees – assessed at $331 per student in 1995, when Southworth first challenged them – go to the health clinic and the student union. The balance goes to more than 100 campus groups, with some getting a few hundred dollars for a speaker or a newsletter and others receiving more than $30,000 a year to pay for offices and staff.

Among the groups receiving university funds are the Internationalist Socialist Organization, the Militant Student Union, the Progressive Student Network, the UW Greens and the Ten Percent Society, the more militant of two gay-rights groups.

"As a conservative Christian, I don't think I should have to fund these violently partisan, anti-Christian hate groups," Southworth said. He characterized the university's response as: "You either pay for these groups or we will kick you out."

The University of Wisconsin has defended the subsidies for student groups steadfastly and says that the array of advocates enriches campus life.

"The groups bring speakers to campus. They show films. They hold debates. They make the campus interesting," said Wisconsin Assistant Attorney General Susan Ullman, who is representing the board of regents.

"This is not compelled speech," she added, since dissenting students such as Southworth are not forced to say anything or endorse a viewpoint. The university's 40,610 students simply pay a fee, which is used by a committee of students to fund campus organizations, she added.

Halloween nostalgia

Boo.

As you can see, I'm still infested with the Halloween spirit. It just won't go away, not even with deodorant. Trust me on this one – walk up to me sometime in December and I'll still probably be scary-looking and freakish, frightening away all the small children and cute women. I don't even have to try – it's just the way I am.

Rob Schulze

I've always loved Halloween. When I was a physically young man (I make that distinction because I'm still a mental six-year-old) I lived for Halloween – it was right up there with Christmas, my birthday, the last day of school, and every time Thundercats was on Channel 56 as one of my favorite times to be alive. I would get grossly excited about a month in advance and start planning the Ultimate Costume, the one that would wow all my friends and make the old people give me their entire candy basket because they just loved it so much.

My costumes always sucked. My parents would never let me be anything good. It would be too expensive, too much trouble, blah blah blah on into eternity. I was never a Ninja Turtle (too expensive). I wasn't even a ninja (too dangerous to wear black in the dark). Everything I wanted to be was too something and so I always got dressed at the last minute, and it always bit big salami.

One year my mother wrapped me in aluminum foil. "You're a robot," she said. "Have fun."

Once I wore black suspenders with a red shirt and a stick that was supposed to be a weapon. "You're a sword guy," she said. "Have fun."

Another time I wore a white sheet with my father's belt to hold it on. "That's a toga," she said. "Robert, isn't seventeen a little old to be trick or treating?"

Maybe it was because my costumes were so bad that I had so many, shall we say, misadventures. Ohhh yeah, I was egged. I was shaving creamed. I had the cool guys jumping out of bushes at me. I was chased by a dog that was, relative to me, the size of the state of Massachusetts. Those weren't so bad – getting egged was kind of fun, actually, if you can believe that. The worst thing was the year that I had a hole in my bag (Sob). Yeah, you heard my right. The whole night Mike Moschella was walking behind me and kept finding candy on the ground, what a lucky bastard, and then two hours later when we were three (that's right, three) houses away from mine I happened to look down into my bag and Oh my God where is all my candy!!??? It sucked real bad, that year. It didn't break me down, though. I just spend the next two weeks performing elaborate espionage activities designed to steal my sister's candy.

So yeah, even though my costumes sucked and I had some bad times, I still loved Halloween, and I was a little reluctant to stop going. Eventually the people at the doors stopped giving me candy and started giving me dirty looks, and I just had to give up the ghost. I firmly believe that if people hadn't stopped giving me free stuff that I would still be out there going from door to door and invading people's privacy, all for the sake of good candy to eat, and mounds of Good 'n Plenty's to throw at my sister.

Of course, now we are all cosmopolitan college students, soaking in the knowledge and culture of the world around, exploring and discovering just exactly what this life is all about. We no longer have the childish need to disguise ourselves in fantasy and wander around our little world, lost in wonder. Now we disguise ourselves and drink alcoholic beverages, and wander around out little world lost in a stupor.

Yes, like all of you I went to a Halloween party. Unlike years past, however, my costume ruled. I had several ideas for possible costumes – Nude Man with Strategic Censored Bar, Pasty Pudgy Balding White Guy, Angry Letter to the Editor, and ninja. I will give you one guess as to what I decided on. I got it at CVS for $3.99, and it was called the "Instant Ninja Kit." It was recommended for toddlers and children, which, of course describes me perfectly. I was a sweet ninja, let me tell you, although I did reach the conclusion that my parents were right – I almost got run over by roughly sixteen trillion cars on my way to my destination.

Ah yes, my destination. To protect the innocent, I will refer to the people who threw this Masquerade as Ott-Sckay and On-Jay (not their real names). Ott-Sckay was an alien and On-Jay was some sort of Portuguese god, and together they mustered all the powers of Outer Space and the heavens to gather together the greatest collection of booze and intoxicated persons that our lowly planet has ever seen.

It was a good time, I thought, and some of the costumes were excellent, even if there were a few too many whore costumes (at least I think they were costumes). I just couldn't really get over the nostalgia of it all – I wanted to be outside, running around, having dairy products flung at me, freezing my nuts off because I'm too cool to wear a jacket over my costume – just living the Halloween nightlife.

"You can't go back in time," I thought to myself regretfully as I attempted to breathe through my mask, which I believe was made of 74% asbestos. "You can eat all the chocolate in sight, though."

The next day I had a fresh batch of holiday zits. Just another part of the great Halloween tradition.

The choice of your life

On the front page of the Boston Sunday Globe, it was being debated whether you should refuse a better job in order to keep your family stable. On one hand, if you keep your job, you can keep your existence in a state of stability, and possibly stay closer to your extended family and friends. On the other hand, you could receive a huge pay increase (Amy Paquette of Stow was offered a $50,000 pay hike) and have to make the adjustment of relocating your family. Paquette refused the job because she and her husband are expecting a child, and they want to stay local near their friends and family.

Emily Vacanti

This answer, refusing a good or even exceptional job offer, is becoming commonplace. More and more, the bread-maker, or money-maker, if you will, in the family is refusing an offer that in the past could not be refused. This move could be interpreted as crazy, but it also could be interpreted as standing your ground.

If I were to be offered a $50,000 pay hike, I would have to take it. A lot of people would think that this is the obvious choice, but that is not entirely true. All that I have to do is look at my father, and my decision is made. To clear that up, I will explain. When I was about three years old, my father was offered a better job, not much better, but better, than he had. This would involve my family moving from Council Bluffs, Iowa to somewhere near Boston (my father got to choose between Winchester and Lexington). He decided to accept the offer, knowing that it could be exactly what he was looking for. So my family moved to Lexington. Now I will admit, I hated Lexington for the majority of the time that I lived there, but that's mainly because it was a rich, ritzy, 'mine doesn't stink' kind of town. Everyone there thinks that they are better than everyone else.

It was not a bad choice, though. I say this because Lexington is a good name. Going to a high school with a good name can help you get into a good college (I got into Stonehill College and Boston University, to name two). By the time I was in seventh grade, I realized this and learned to deal with life there. After we had lived there for 15 or 16 years, my father got another offer. This one he absolutely could not refuse. This position is at UMass- Worcester. I don't know the details of it (they're not my business), but I know that his power increased substantially, and that it would involve our moving to a town near Worcester.

All that my father had to decide, in his mind, was what our new address would be. I was excited about getting out of Lexington forever. There were a few perks about life there (I had a great job at the local pharmacy for instance), but I wanted to be happier in my home away from college. So the whole family moved. My father could not be happier with his new job, my mother loves life out in the middle of nowhere, I love living in Amherst year-round (It's nice to visit Uxbridge. I don't feel as though I have to prove anything to anyone there.), my brother enjoys living in Worcester, a 30 minute drive from home. We are all very happy. This opportunity would not have arisen if my father had not taken the Boston job offer. Honestly, I don't think that I've ever missed Lexington. I miss Iowa because my grandparents and a couple of other relatives live there. But the move to Uxbridge and UMass Medical was one of the best decisions that my father could have ever made.

This is definitely not the case for other families, though. Many families are for lifelong stability. They think that no child should move from one house to another, even once, until he or she goes off to college. This way the child has never experienced home instability. Instead, they will have been brought up in a stable home, with a stable life, which in no way prepares them for the major change of scenery that is associated with the move to college. Their parents can help them adjust a little, and there's always an RA, but you can't really easily adjust to moving until you've done it at least once. On the other hand, I know many people who made the transition of living in one house with a whole life to moving into a college dormitory very well. They looked at the move positively. They took the view that it's moving from one small, close-knit family, to a huge, extended family (the dorm). But I also know many students who did not take this move well at all.

To give you a specific example, in my senior year of high school, I was talking to one of my teachers who was helping us to prepare for the adjustment. She said that people who moved around some would have a much easier time. Her example was a girl in the suite above her. My teacher and several other women were comforting her during the first two weeks of school saying, "It's okay. Stop crying. You'll see your parents on Parent's Weekend." By the beginning of the third week, it was very annoying. This girl had never moved before, and was taking it very hard. Everyone got sick of her. So moving before college can easily be considered a good thing.

Unfortunately, there are many different aspects that you have to take into consideration before you can make the decision; 'to move or not to move. That is the question.' Today, both parents support many households. Years ago this was not the case. This is one of the biggest reasons that families were so okay with moving. But values and ideals have changed. Now that both parents are working, you have to take into consideration if your spouse will be able to find work. The solution to this is many companies have branches across the country. If your spouse gets an excellent offer that they should not financially refuse, then you should put effort into seeing about transferring. Who knows? You may find your dream job in the other city/town. It happens.

Something very similar to this happened to my mother. She is a teacher, mostly to fill in for my ex-principal when necessary. When we moved to Lexington, she started to teach in the Winchester Catholic School that I went to. A couple of years before we moved to Uxbridge, Mrs. Kavanaugh (my ex-principal) left St. Mary's and moved to another school. St. Mary's had a psychotic priest that was running things. Mrs. Kanavaugh's new school was much better. And whenever she needs someone to fill in for her kindergarten class, she calls my mother. This way my mother gets to continue her teaching of kindergarten, but is not committed to teaching it five days a week for the duration of the school year. My mother would not gave gotten this opportunity if it wasn't for my father moving, both from Iowa to Lexington, and then from Lexington to Uxbridge. My mother is very happy with this arrangement. Things work out in mysterious ways. You just have to trust your heart.

It's Pat!

Pat Buchanan is a _____. What would you put in that empty space? Some would say that he is a great American, some would say that he is a fringe racist and a few more would say that he is the political equivalent of the plague. Pat Buchanan is once again gracing us with his presence in the quest to be president. He definitely makes the race a little more interesting, and as of now he is a man without a party.

Pat renounced his life long membership to the Republican Party just last week and is now seeking the nomination of the Reform Party. Party figurehead Jesse Ventura has already come out against Buchanan and Pat knows that he's in for an uphill fight. One of his competitors, Donald Trump, spoke about Buchanan on "Meet The Press" two weeks ago. When asked about who votes for Buchanan, Trump answered, "He gets the wacko vote... the fringe wacko vote." Not a good idea to call a pretty sizeable group of people "wacko". They are Americans and they agree with what Buchanan has to say (thankfully not many of the rest of us do).

Before you go calling Pat names like fascist, racist, and even ugly, you should have a reason. The ugly part is pretty self-explanatory, the man looks like he died ten minutes ago and no one told him. The rest of the names must be warranted right? What has Pat said or done to be called a racist, fascist, etc.? A quick look at his biography will tell the story.

Pat on the media:

Buchanan always describes the media as liberal and he being a staunch conservative is constantly at odds with them. Surprisingly, when Pat isn't running to be the leader of the free world he pulls home about a million dollars a year, working for the "liberal" media that he hates so much.

Pat on immigration:

"I will stop immigration cold," said Pat on CNN. Buchanan is not a fan of immigration, or more fittingly immigrants. In 1984 Pat wrote that he would like to build a wall around America to keep "Spanish-speaking brown and black people out." Pat likes to talk about how many jobs immigrants and trade agreements have cost America, but Pat has actually made a profit on them! He is a large shareholder in AT&T and when they laid off 40,000 workers he made a very, very big profit. The sick fact is, he went on national TV and renounced the layoffs while his pockets were being stuffed from their economic benefit.

Pat on Adolph Hitler:

Thank the lord that a newspaper can't be used to break anything because after you read some of what Pat has had to say about Adolph Hitler, you will have some extra aggression. "[Hitler was] an individual of great courage, a soldier's soldier...[and] a political organizer of the first rank." Wow! That's great! Hitler was a lot of things, none of which should ever be associated with the word great. He has some more to say about Adolph. "Hitler's success was not based on his extraordinary gifts alone." To paraphrase the rest of the quote he says that Hitler's genius was based on his ability to manipulate his people. It kind of makes you wonder what Pat would do if he got to lead all of us!

Brian Lohnes

Pat on Jewish people:

Pat Buchanan has a real problem with Jewish people. One of his former aides described it like this, "Buchanan is an extremist who Anti-Semitism would rank at level four or five – on a scale that has Adolph Hitler at ten and Black Muslim leader Rev. Louis Farrakhan at a seven." Pat has described Congress as "Israeli-occupied territory". This is a man who wants to run our country, and there are actually people who bear the name of Pat Buchanan and think, "Wow, there a guy we should all be like!" Frightening isn't it?

Pat on who is involved in his campaign.

The key to getting you message spread when running for office is to have a good campaign staff. Pat Buchanan knows all about this, he always seems to have people who are supportive of his views. Unfortunately, some of these people have a less than stellar past. Take Samuel Francis, a man who has called for a "white conquest of the United States", or maybe Susan Lamb a woman involved in the "National Association for the Advancement of White People", an organization founded by David Duke. Pat has some pretty strong ties to Duke, several members of former campaigns also worked for Mr. Duke.

So there it is, a look at Pat Buchanan. Remember that all of this is factual information, all of the quotes are real, the people are real and the names haven't been changed to protect the guilty. Pat Buchanan is not a great guy, he is definitely on the fringe of things, he is pro-life, anti-immigration, a man who seems to have some sick fascination with Hitler and he runs with a pretty loony crowd. The election is coming, know the candidates, know the issues, and most of all know where you stand on them. I hope that you will vote; it is the future of our country. We need to care more, we need to know about guys like Pat Buchanan and David Duke and we need to remember that we "make them". We put these people in the place that they are and we can remove them. This next election is very important. We are choosing a leader for the next millennium, someone who will have to deal with a different set of problems than ever before. So please speak with your ballot, strike a blow against the likes of Pat Buchanan and one for our generation. It's up to us to make the change.

(P.S. – To the idiots who called my room and called me a few choice words last year after I spoke about David Duke and racism... don't do it again.)

One-Woman Play Strikes Chord

By Jamie Loo
Collegian Correspondent

A reading of Urban Tattoo took place last Thursday, October 28, at the Augusta Savage Gallery. Urban Tattoo is a one-woman show written by, author and performer, Marie Humber Clements.

The actual production includes video portions and slides projected on scrim along with an emphasis on the lights used to enhance the mood and actions of the character, Rose Marie. The production is a reflection of Rose Marie's life and the healing processes she goes through in her darkest hours. Rose Marie reflects on her childhood as well as the decades as they pass by, the 40s, 50s, the footsteps of soldiers in the 60s, the voices of protest in the 70s and the lines of welfare, drugs, and food in the 80s. She spoke of her experience growing up in Canada and the first time she saw an African-American.

As a child and into early adulthood, Rose Marie went through her own identity struggle dealing with her dual race of being Irish and Native-American. Between her two worlds she goes back to her childhood and her dreams seeking healing from the stars, rain and earth. From her sexual abuse as a young woman to being in the "jail of marriage," Rose Marie re-emerges in the end a stronger person.

The audience was impressed by Clements' incredible stage presence in her performance of the reading. UMass students like Josh Arond, Heather Lord, and Dean Woodbury raved about the performance.

Dean Woodbury, a theater major, commented on how, "all of Clements' actions connected with her speech and you could tell that her performance was very personal."

Josh Arond, a music major who worked with Clements earlier that day in a class, said "you could really feel the creative inspiration, and how much work was put into the writing."

Heather Lord, a theater major, found the production "very interactive" and praised Clements' usage of metaphorical images.

All three agreed that a reading is a completely different form of performance as opposed to seeing the actual production. In a reading, you are made to draw your own conclusions and imagine your own visuals that aren't there.

Marie Humber Clements is an award winning playwright and performer whose work has attracted attention internationally. She recently completed an independent film entitled Continuum as well as giving birth to her first child. Clements started writing Urban Tattoo about 4 years ago. She says that it is a mixture of family history and life experiences mixed with fiction. Clements hopes to bring the actual production of Urban Tattoo to UMass next year. Clements next stop is in Ohio.

Sister-to-Sister

Ladies, can we talk please? You see, I am having this problem and personally I feel the need to address it immediately. I am not exactly sure what is causing the problem but I can tell you that I have heard numerous complaints concerning this animosity between black females.

What am I referring to? All of you ladies that, for some reason or another, have difficulty communicating or accepting other black females. Yes you, all you ladies out there who fit any of these titles below.

The Liar: These are the ladies who pretend to be friendly and yet are anything but. They will smile in your face. They even pretend to care about something you have said, but then they are quick to talk behind your back.

> "Someone has allowed them to believe that they are better and their do-do doesn't stink."
> Jennifer Lodge

The Too-Gooders: These are all the ladies who can't/don't/won't speak. This is even if you do first. Why? For some odd reason, someone has allowed them to believe that they are better and their do-do doesn't stink.

The Ghetto Girls: You know who you are. Loudmouth pigeons that speak up whenever the hell you please. Unless, of course, the person you are talking about is right in front of your face and then you whisper about them.

The Hypocritical Ladies: Oh yeah, all of you who attended affirmative action meetings screaming that we need unity and you are the first ones to go dog another female about her dress, her appearance, or her hair.

The Clickers: Well, what is there to say about you? These are words of advice but I know you will not accept any. You are the ones that think you're blacker than black and straight from Africa. You ladies are by far the worst. You congregate in these clicks with females resembling yourself. I do not mean resembling other sisters necessarily. I mean literally wearing similar outfits with the same hairdo's, shoes, and jackets. You cannot meet or hang out with anyone outside of that group.

Ladies, is this you? Now I know that, at a time or two, I catch myself floating between one of these titles but I am quick to catch myself because I never want to limit myself. How does that look if I say, "unite" one day and on any other day I am practicing division? Who's playing whom?

I'm telling all of you that are quick to stare someone down, raise your eyebrow and then point out mistakes because clothes are not from The Gap, The Limited, or Express. Or shoes are not from Aldo's or Nine West, or a jacket is not top of the line right out of the Sky Goose down. Get a life. Or those of you who are quick to look at a person cockeyed because they speak proper and are educated. You think it doesn't exist but I encounter these things all of time.

Personally it's degrading to our selves. You are supposedly here to grow as a person but what kind of growth is this? We are only moving backwards. So today if some ebbo black sister smiles, or speaks or waves, do it back. Acknowledge this friendly gesture and respond who is it going to hurt? Sister to sister, can we work together on this.

Randoms

The other day, I was recovering from a bad hangover. Those two Jurcardi Breezers that I had were so damn potent. As I leaned over the toilet, hanging on for life, these really random thoughts came to me:

* Aren't Kidd Rock and Limp Bizkit just a cheap rip-off of the Beastie Boys, who are then just a cheap rip-off of Run-DMC?
* Minorities on campus complain about the diversity pages of the Collegian but no one writes for them.
* Isn't it funny how the media makes such a big deal that there are a handful of Latin singers with CD's on the top 40? Is this supposed to make up for their lack of representation everywhere else? Like it isn't bad enough that these "Latin" CD's are merely pop with some Spanglish in it.
* Speaking of under representations: did you know that there isn't one Hispanic on the Major League Baseball All-Century team? That is like having no blacks on an NBA All-Century team, or no samples on a Puff Daddy album, or no alcoholic rapists at a frat party.
* The best thing about being white is that your song is always on the radio.
* Doesn't this freshman class look so diverse? I've seen more minorities at a Pat Buchanan rally.
* Warning: only three readers will understand this one. It has been five years and I still don't know what Redman meant by "I switch speeds like Bruce Lee riding a Fuji in a movie."
* How do you act "black?"
* Note to self: It is not pronounced "Bale-ee-mus."
* Why is it when a minority speaks in complete sentences, white people always say that, "he's so articulate."
* Why isn't pro-wrestling ever covered on "SportsCenter?"
* If you think about it, America's dirty little secret is the struggle between the classes. Rednecks are just poor, white, black people.
* Homophobia is the only freely accepted form of prejudice.
* American Beauty is best movie of the year.
* You're ghetto if you save your cooking grease.
* You're even more ghetto if you have a small TV on top of a bigger, non-working one.
* Speaking of ghetto, there is nothing wrong with using fake names to get free CD's from BMG.
* There are two flaws in vegans logic 1) most vegetables grow in animal manure and 2) vegetables are living things, too. They are just easier to catch.
* There ain't nothing wrong with a big ass.
* Affirmative action 1954-1999. R.I.P.

Poem of the week
My Song

slammed against the brick wall-VIOLATED taken away what was once mine,
don't dare say it was fine...
You broke your words boy
I was never your toy...
I hurt real bad and watching me suffer didn't make you mad.
No need to follow my path
I've healed myself, taken a cleansin' bath...
For my heart, mind + soul
I was falling apart now
I'm whole
The funny part is...your far away
I don't need to fear you coming my way...
You thought you made me latched
but thanks to love my heart is now patched.
because of this I am strong and one of these days, hmm, you'll hear my song.

Cigarettes Harm China

By Henry Chu
Los Angeles Times

BEIJING _ Liu Boqi has seen the future, and it scares him. It's lying there in Ward 8, staring back through the watery eyes of Shi Benai.

For days, Shi has been bedridden, waiting to have a walnut-sized tumor removed from his right lung. Liu, an oncologist, hasn't had the heart yet to tell his patient that the cancer is fairly advanced, the product of years of heavy smoking.

"I smoked three or four packs a day," Shi admitted weakly, his arm hooked up to an IV drip monitored closely by his hovering wife. "My fingers were black."

Throughout the rest of the ward, dozens of patients like Shi wait for surgery that they hope will save them from becoming yet another statistic in an escalating public health disaster of epic proportions.

In China, one in every eight male deaths is caused by smoking. It is a grim ratio expected to rise to 1 in 3 by the year 2050. If current patterns hold, experts say, nearly 3 million deaths a year in the nation will be attributable to tobacco, making it by far the leading cause of death in China. Most of the epidemic's victims will be men like Shi, 55, long-time smokers who began lighting up in their teens. Most will die prematurely, before their 70th birthday.

And most will contribute to a social crisis that will spawn not just staggering health-care costs, but also a whole class of women left behind, nicotine widows forced to fend for themselves.

The key, anti-tobacco advocates agree, is getting at people early in life to prevent them from lighting up, particularly young men, since smoking is almost exclusively a male pastime in China. Three hundred million Chinese men _ more than the entire U.S. population _ smoke, compared to just 1 percent of women.

But changing habits is easier said than done in a culture where cigarettes are ubiquitous _ presented as wedding gifts, used as bribes and laid out for guests in homes the way Americans might now offer peanuts.

And despite a well-publicized study last year warning of the decimation ahead, government action to promote public awareness remains minuscule. A report last month by the Journal of the American Medical Association found that only 40 percent of Chinese know smoking can cause lung cancer. Even fewer know it can lead to heart disease.

"For so many years we said there was no harm from smoking. Now we're saying there is," Liu said. "To change people's ways oft thinking is tremendously difficult."

Liu, who has 35 years' experience as a physician, works at the Cancer Research Institute in Beijing, the best cancer treatment center in the country.

Exact figures for the number of lung cancer deaths in China are hard to come by. But researchers say that middle-aged smokers here are three times as likely to contract lung cancer as nonsmokers and twice as likely to suffer from other respiratory diseases, such as tuberculosis.

Reaching young men is the goal of tobacco-control activists, who had hoped that last year's study in the British Medical Journal would galvanize the government into stronger action, much as the 1964 Surgeon General's report on smoking did in the United States.

The Communist regime can count some successes, such as local ordinances in most major cities banning smoking in public places. Yet the rules are only spattily enforced, as evidenced by the young man who lit up one morning in the stairwell of the cancer hospital itself, directly beneath a no-smoking sign.

Public health experts have tried to convince the government that the costs of health care and lost worker productivity outweigh the money pouring in from sales, but to no avail. The Beijing regime even refused to impose a small excise tax on cigarettes for fear of inciting "social instability," activists say.

So the government relies instead on Zhang's association as its foremost tool for spreading the word on smoking. The central health ministry in Beijing referred all inquiries to the organization. Its budget, however, is microscopic, to the point of absurdity: just $36,000 a year, most of which goes to the salaries of the association's nine staff members _ and only $6,000 of which actually comes from the government itself. By contrast, California alone spends $400 million a year on its anti-tobacco efforts. Activists here rely on donations and help from groups like the World Health Organization. Role models, too, are in scarce supply. Characters on TV shows constantly puff away, celebrities demand high fees for lending their star power to anti-smoking campaigns, and an estimated 50 percent of doctors and teachers light up, making their warnings of the dangers of smoking ring hollow.

"Smoking is bad for your health, but so what?" said Chen Wei, a skinny 15-year-old who has already been smoking for two years.

"Pollution is bad for your health, too, but you can't do anything about it. Smoking won't add too much to it."

And once a smoker, virtually always a smoker in China, where only a tiny fraction of people manage to give it up. For those wanting to quit, there is little institutional or social support and plenty of pressure from friends and co-workers to keep on smoking.

Haunted Hill on Shaky Ground

David Troupes
Collegian Staff

The House on Haunted Hill directed by William Malone with Geoffrey Rush, Famke Janssen, Taye Diggs showing at Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield

Halloween weekend has the unfortunate effect of allowing inferior horror movies to make more money than they deserve, and never has this been truer than with The House on Haunted Hill. This is perhaps the worst scary movie I've ever seen. It is the soulless product of a Hollywood studio that knew it wouldn't have to make any effort to turn a profit. I can't decide where to begin in listing everything wrong with the movie.

First, though, I'll give the movie credit for the two (and only two) times it managed to be scary. There were a couple instances of spooky, disturbing images that flashed across the screen and caught the audience off guard. Bwah! I was scared. But that's it. None of that fright lingered longer than the image was on-screen, however; it was so unrelated to the rest of the movie that after the moment was past, I couldn't imagine why it was included, except as an attempt to inject some cheap thrills into an otherwise pedestrian movie.

Which brings us to the first of many problems with The House on Haunted Hill: the plot (although I use that term loosely, since I don't think the goings-on in this movie actually qualify as a plot). The script uses whatever rushed, contrived excuse it needs to gather a group of people together at a haunted house, and then lets them run around until all but two of them are dead. I could go into more detail, but it wouldn't do you any good; events unfold in an arbitrary, haphazard manner that never lets you care at all about what might happen next.

Interesting characters are essential for effective storytelling and getting an audience's attention, and this movie came up entirely empty in that department. To say that the characters were all stereotypes would be understating their shallowness: they didn't even qualify as stereotypes. They were non-characters. The movie's one stab at meaningful interaction within the group is a laughably superficial pseudo-romance between Eddie (Taye Diggs) and Sara (Ali Larter) involving little more than a butt-grabbing scene.

The writing is awful, and primarily to blame for all of the characters' shortcomings. When Eddie first steps through the door to the haunted house, he declares, "Damn, this place is scary, yo!" Word. I think the writer saw a commercial for a Spike Lee movie once and decided he knew how to write for a black character. Never does the dialogue for any character rise above the level of high school writing, dragging its characters through some of the lamest scenes and exchanges ever witnessed.

I'd tell you to keep your eye out for a cameo by Lilith Fair diva Lisa Loeb, but I wouldn't want to feel responsible for anyone actually spending money to see this movie. Avoid at all costs.

Grade: F

The House on Haunted Hill sinks into the lowest regions of failing horror films.

Hitchcock Rides the Iron Horse

By Bob Grover
Collegian Correspondent

Robyn Hitchcock
Iron Horse
October 31st

Robyn Hitchcock's show at the Iron Horse Sunday night suffered a mixed bag for a packed house. Confusion between the house and artist deprived the band of a sound check, which led to later technical problems. More than two decades experience in the industry enabled Hitchcock to rise above the sound difficulties and put on outstanding performance.

Opening the show solo, Hitchcock delivered the first batch of songs acoustically. When the microphone on his guitar failed, he charmed the audience with the odd observations of the world that dominate his songs. He presented songs in the guise of a French tourist and challenged the audience's belief of exactly what sorts of topics lines suits made (instead of the accepted roar, he mutters more of a car-alarm sound). One stand-out moment came in the introduction to the song "My Wife and my Dead Wife," which he revealed was written with Frank Sinatra in mind.

With few songs, another member of his back-up band would join in (he is backed by the superb Departure Lounge, who doubled as the opening act), allowing each new batch of songs to grow increasingly dense. Tim Keegan, the singer/guitarist of Departure Lounge joined Hitchcock for a double harmonic sound that made ironic "Sinister, But She Was Happy" sour.

When the full band hit was assembled on stage they launched into "The Cheese Alarm" and the walls shook.

The highlight of the evening was the presence of Kimberly Rew, a former bandmate of Hitchcock's. Rew and Hitchcock have not toured together in 17 years, when they were in the seminal Soft Boys, but the synergy the two men shared was evident in the performance. Rew took an unassuming posture on stage and proceeded to wrap himself around his guitar, unleashing a sonic barrage that stomped on the terra.

Hitchcock, who is touring with a full band for the first time in six years, sampled his entire catalogue during the 90 plus minute set. Drawing heavily from his last two studio albums the show offered the rare tune for the hard-core fans ("It Sounds Great When Your Dead") and radio friendly songs for the casual fan ("Madonna of the Wasps"). Hitchcock also tossed a few covers by his idols (including a powerful rendition of Bob Dylan's "Visions of Johanna," the song Hitchcock says prompted him to begin writing). He and Rew clearly demonstrated why their work in the Soft Boys is among the best rock music most people have never heard. The two worked together so well it was hard to imagine that there have been three different men in the White House since they last toured.

For a man who recently said that rockers over 40 ought to have a license before picking up an electric guitar on-stage, Hitchcock (who's 46) showed that it is not unbecoming for the middle-aged to plug in, so long as they still have something to say. Hitchcock showed Sunday night that he clearly has a lot left to say.

A Night in the Asylum

By Charles Derdiarian
Collegian Correspondent

SPRINGFIELD — When I arrived at the Freaky 2 rave in Hartford last Friday night, the doors were shut and almost as many police lined the street as partygoers. Refusing to let Freaky's cancellation ruin my Friday night, I headed north to the grand opening of Springfield's new after-hours club, Asylum. Taking over for the down-and-out Club Kaos, Asylum provides everything needed for a great after-hours experience and many in attendance agreed that Asylum does a good job of one-upping Kaos.

Doors open at 10 p.m. and stay open all night. Cover charge was $10 on Friday, but is expected to go up to $15. When I arrived at 11 p.m. the floor was close to empty, but by 2 a.m. many who tried going to Freaky decided to hit Asylum and the place filled up.

To stimulate the senses, Asylum sports an impressive sound system with plenty of bass to shake your spine. Two adequate light shows scan the crowd, and large, ceiling-high fluorescent murals adorn the walls.

The most important part of a club is the music, though, and Asylum delivers. The club DJ, perched on a balcony overlooking the dance-floor, spun some of the fastest, heaviest house I've heard in a long time. Sampling tunes like Armand Van Helden's newest single, "Boogie Monster," and Johnny Vicious' hypnotic "Ecstasy," the beats didn't stop until closing time.

Unlike most clubs in Boston, Asylum is well ventilated and allows water bottles inside. Security was tight on Friday and made up of several Springfield police officers, though the crowd paid little or no attention to their presence. The club's attitude towards party-goers is simple. What you do outside of the club is your business, just don't bring your business inside, or you will be busted. The crowd seemed content to leave problems outside, though, and ear-to-ear smiles were the norm.

The dress code is more lax than Dairy Mart's, with many dancers losing their shirt and shoes by the end of the night. The entire club is a dance floor, allowing for plenty of space to bounce your brains out, even do back flips. Lounges line the walls of one section of the club, providing a comfortable area to conduct serious 4 a.m. conversation. The only major area for improvement I saw was the plywood floor that made up the main dance area.

No, it's not as exclusive as most big-city clubs, but this is western Massachusetts and we take what we can get when it comes to house music and late-night reveling. Exclusiveness is an overrated ego-trip anyway. Asylum provided a quick save for a seemingly shot night last Friday, and deserves a serious look from Amherst's late night party people. I know you're out there.

Type O Shakes Avalon Positively

Type O Negative
Avalon Nightclub
October 30th

As the evening sun set over the city of Boston last Saturday night, the cool autumn air set in, and Brooklyn's goth-metal band Type O Negative were set to give another powerful performance for their "Disas-tour 99," a show at the recently renovated Avalon Night Club on Landsdowne Street in Boston, on the night before Halloween. The tour is in support of the band's latest release, World Coming Down, which came out on September 21st.

The main opening act, Puya, kicked things off with their Puerto Rican style, aggressive, in-your-face, live energy. Although their songs are written entirely in Spanish they still succeeded at moving many people with their unique sound— a mix of Spanish-influenced percussion (including shakas and congas), combined with heavy guitars and melodic bass lines. Surprisingly enough, this went over quite well with the audience, who was there for a much different sound – the Black Sabbath-influenced, uniquely heavy, mysterious sound that is Type O Negative. The applause for Puya was well-deserved, but the crowd really started to roar when smoke permeated the room, shining through mystical, deep green lighting; for this could only mean one thing: Type O negative was about to take the stage...

As the monstrous men appeared through the fog, the scene was quite reminiscent of something from Stephen King's, "The Tommyknockers." Mammoth 6-foot-6 frontman/bassist Peter Steele welcomed the crowd to the show amid the tremendous roar from the screaming fans, as keyboardist Josh Silver played the eerie opening to "My Girlfriend's Girlfriend," from the October Rust album, to start the night off with a bang. The band immediately followed by performing World Coming Down's title track, followed by an intense version of "In Praise of Bacchus," again from October Rust.

The Avalon's new added space due to the renovation became quite apparent as nearly every soul in the building responded to Type O playing the first few notes of the once-popular radio hit, "Christian Woman," from the band's largely successful 1993 release, Bloody Kisses. After a vehement cover of the Black Sabbath song, "N.I.B.," Type O continued to play more songs from their new album, including "Everyone I Love is Dead," the almost cheerful "Pyretta Blaze," and the passionate "Everything Dies," arguably one of the best tracks from the new album.

Guitarist Kenny Hickey's incredibly dark and creepy, yet melodic guitar lines were outshined only by lead singer Peter Steele's deep, ominous, penetrating vocals, in songs such as "Der Untermensch," and "Wolf Moon." Soon after, however the lights went out, and the band was ready to hear the audience beg for an encore. In response to shouts of "...we want more!" from the crowd, Steele, who has never been know to communicate much with his fans during shows, replied sarcastically with "You guys sound like you're on welfare or something – always wanting more!" The band then slowly formed an introduction to, and then performed a beautiful, almost tear inducing "Love You to Death," from October Rust. What would have been the best performance of the night was exceeded only by the band's final, and truly outstanding song, the wide spread favorite, "Black No. 1" from Bloody Kisses. As Steele's rich voice echoed throughout the building, thousands of other voices in the crowd could be heard singing along to the song's powerful melody; their fists raised high in the air, and a number "one" formed with their fingers.

At that, Steele thanked the raving crowd to end the show, saying that they meant everything to the band, and that they would be nowhere with out them. But in the end, it was the fans that thanked Steele and the rest of the gang from Type O Negative for putting on such an amazing Halloween performance.

Type O Negative ripped up the Avalon Saturday night.

How to Groove on the Net

Internet Site of the week: http://www.bustamove.com

Well, since these people took the time to make numerous solicitations and shameless attempts to promote their website, I figured I might as well take the time to trash it.

Do you want to learn how to dance? Yes? Well, then get off that rolling chair in front of the computer and go take lessons. Do not, under any circumstances, go to bustamove.com. This site claims that it will teach you how to dance for the small price of $1 a step. That's not so bad, you may say. Well, consider that some foreign salsas have 15 or more steps repeated over and over again. After a while, that's some serious cash.

Even if the premise — that you could learn to dance by surfing the Net — were not inane, the site design is childish. So, take my advice and don't bust-a-move, but into the real world.

Or the digital world, which just got a big boost from Dow Jones Newswires. The company, most noted for their financial coverage (hence the Dow Jones Industrials) will sell compact versions of their regular news service to online brokers for redistribution to individual investors. This marks a major step in the continuing move of normal financial services online.

Online investors might also want to check out 1.earn2.com. The company recently announced that it will provide AOL users with a tutorial to the personal finance section, teaching them how to use AOL's stock and fund charting tools.

When do you know something is big? Easy, when Steven Spielberg is interested. Witness Spielberg read the script of American Beauty once and sent it into immediate production without a single change. Well, Spielberg is moving to the Internet with Pop.com. The Web site, which also has Ron Howard and Microsoft co-founder Paul Allen aboard, will broadcast live-action, animated and other short features over the Net. There will be daily five to six minute movies available for download each day, focusing mostly on comedy.

If you're still doubting, then here's a statistic for you. The "Internet Economy" contributed an estimated $507 billion to the U.S. economy and employed 2.3 million Americans in the first quarter of this year, according to a University of Texas study released today by Cisco Systems (overlook for now the fact that Cisco has a vested interest in inflating these numbers). That number is a 68-percent increase from last year and puts Internet-related businesses ahead of both the telecommunications industry and the airline industry when it comes to contributing to the US economy.

Viacom, who already operates the popular MTV website has announced the launch of another site supporting a different cable network, Nick.com will be the official Nickelodeon website will have a number of features for kids six to 14 years old.

The aforementioned MTV and Paul Allen have both agreed to support RioPort.com. The site, not to be confused with the popular portable digital music player, will provide music and spoken word programming on-line.

The Internet may stink, but this is ridiculous.

Digiscents has announced a partnership with steaming media giant, Real Networks. The company plans to deliver digital smells via the Internet. That's right, you'll be able to smell while you surf. As an example, the company says the application would trigger the smell of roses and daffodils when you're visiting an e-commerce Web site selling flowers. The company plans to distribute custon-made speakers with embedded scents, which can be activated via instructions in streaming multimedia. The deal with Real Networks will allow these signals to be activated by that company's Real Player.

Adam Martignetti

Moving from scent on-demand to images on demand, Barnesandnoble.com announced that they will offer their customers selected images produced on museum-quality canvas or high-quality paper. The company also launched an electronic greeting card service offering images that can be personalized and enhanced with animation and music.

In an effort to reach a full third of the total Internet audience (and yes that's a big deal nowadays) Lycos recently acquired Bluemountain.com from Blue Mountain Arts Publishing Co. Bluemountain is far and away the largest e-greetings card site. And the acquisition will put Lycos at a 34 percent span of all Internet users.

Lycos will also be doing their best to link some on the underground Internet culture. New York-based Feed (www.feedmag.com), the Smoking Gun (www.thesmokinggun.com), AltCulture (www.altculture.com), Word (www.word.com) and San Francisco's Suck (www.suck.com) will all be linked by a new network being formed by Web-hosting company Tripod, which of course is owned by Lycos.

Ibeam broadcasting and House of Blues Digital (hob.com) have teamed to start an affiliate network of sorts for Internet Service Providers and content portals. Network affiliates will get free access to HOB.com's broadcast events and share in the revenues of weekly Pay Per View events.

Marc Andreessen, one of the original founders of Netscape, has started a new company called Loudcloud Inc. which is aimed at helping businesses exploit the Internet. Although details are still sketchy, the venture will supposedly provide technology and services to high-growth Internet companies.

In perhaps the most sane Internet combination to date, Stamps.com agreed to acquire Iship.com. Iship provides Internet-based shipping technology. So, now you won't have to leave the office to pay for postage and send a package.

The site formerly known as NewsPage.com will now be known as Individual.com, thereby reflecting a new focus for the news providers. The company will deliver personalizes news and information from business, financial, trade and industry sources via its Web site and daily e-mails.

Catalogs, whose traditional business is mail order, are set to double their Internet sales from last year. Although the Internet accounts for 5 percent of all their sales, most cataloguers are still using the Net as a way to promote their name and gain more exposure.

Bryant, et al, to understand what's expected. However, upstairs they aren't used to outspoken coaches, and Jackson's jibes, like his steadfast pining for Scottie Pippen, couldn't be reverberating any louder if O'Neal turned up the stereo speakers in his van all the way and drove it into Jerry West's office. It's now almost universally agreed, even within the organization, that trading Eddie Jones and Elden Campbell for Glen Rice was a terrible mistake (which, truth in punditry obliges me to note, I endorsed at the time).

Rice is now a) making the transition from a No. 1 option to being a co-No. 2; b) an awkward fit, or c) completely out of his element.

It had always been assumed that Jones and Bryant, shooting guards, were on a collision course, and, of course, at $7 million, Campbell was a tad pricey for a reserve.

However, management failed to factor in Bryant's early-season success at small forward. Then there was the emerging notion that the real problem was defense, at which Jones excelled. Kurt Rambis had that figured out, which was why he was fidgeting so badly when the deal went down.

Jackson was reportedly told that if events prove they need Pippen, management will try to get him since Portland was willing to make the deal. Of course, unless the Trail Blazers are in trouble in December too, General Manager Bob Whitsitt may not feel like sending the Lakers a key piece as a Christmas present.

Owner Jerry Buss acknowledges shooting down the Pippen deal for financial reasons. Pippen may get as much as $42 million in the last two years of his contract, when the new dollar-for-dollar luxury tax kicks in.

However, the reported package for Pippen, Rice, Robert Horry and Travis Knight, now gets $15 million a season and Rice, a free agent next summer, wants a $120 million deal to stay, assuming the Lakers want to keep him. Otherwise, the best they'll get for Rice is whatever is available in a sign-and-trade.

"It will be a season which I'll probably be coming to Jerry West's office and say, 'Jerry, there are some guys here who cannot learn what we're trying to do,'" Jackson told the Chicago Tribune early in camp.

" 'If we're going to have a team that is consistent, we're going to have to change some personnel to meet the kind of things we have to do.' "

Lakerdom trembles, waiting to hear what Jerry answers.

Don't book those parade floats just yet. The Lakers have the little matter of a paradigm shift to see if they can make it through first.

After years of suffering from, and being, an urban blight, the Clippers are looking good and not just because they're offering NBA ball at discounted prices in a sparkling new arena, if one that wasn't color-coordinated with them in mind.

For the moment, at least, they're loaded with bright young players, led by Lamar Odom, who may be a rookie feeling his way around, but is plainly special, a 6-foot-10 athlete who handles like a point and has that rare knack of making the pieces fall in place, just by walking on the floor.

"I think the Clippers got lucky, or figured something out that no one else figured out because I think he's really going to be good," said Milwaukee Coach George Karl last week.

"Any time you play with the good players, some players get awe-struck by it and other players are lifted up by it. I think Odom's one of the guys that likes it....

"I know he's pretty good because other players are talking about him. I've already gotten four or five guys tell me, 'Hey, that Odom kid is pretty good.' His handle, his sense for the ball, there's no way that can't get better."

What could go wrong now?

Well, of course, there's Sterling, owner, chairman of the board and chief impediment, coming off his summer triumph of failing to secure Maurice Taylor, who, wonder of wonders, actually wanted to stay.

Sterling has never understood that in order to answer years of league-wide scorn, he'll have to pay a premium to get someone to re-up.

Once, that might have been whatever some agent, like Danny Manning's representative, Ron Grinker, dreamed up. Now it's capped by the new bargaining agreement at $70 million over seven years.

This isn't like shopping at Costco, but now, with rookies on a five-year scale, Taylor and Derek Anderson were the last major long-term commitments Sterling was going to have to make until Michael Olowokandi became a free agent in 2005.

Moreover, there wasn't a single Clipper official counseling Sterling not to offer Taylor the maximum.

They could have given Taylor the $70 million, locked up Anderson for $50 million and taken the field with some actual morale for a change, rather than the second-best thing. As Anderson put it, "We are going to work this whole year, because I don't know how long they'll keep us together."

I don't know how long, although I have a hunch, but while this lasts, it might be fun.

"You know, that takes time to learn a person. You see a person's true colors when you're going through adverse times, and I think a little of that had to happen to this team before Jeff was able to see our true character. I think he's still learning."

According to a popular notion, there's a breed of player known as "Van Gundy guys," the prime examples being Ewing and Oakley, whose departure the coach mourned openly for much of last season. "No, it's not true," Van Gundy says. "Three years ago, they said (John) Starks was Van Gundy's guy and (Alan) Houston wasn't. Now Houston is and the next guy isn't. In another year or two, if I'm around, they'll be saying Sprewell and Camby are Van Gundy's guys, and the next new set of guys, they're not because you don't develop that trust overnight."

Clearly, it's important to Camby and Sprewell to gain Van Gundy's faith in their ability, but when Sprewell missed the Knicks' six-day training camp in Charleston, S.C., while driving cross-country after defending himself in a civil suit in the Oakland area, it provoked more intense scrutiny of his relationship with the coach. Van Gundy responded by saying relationships don't matter if they don't affect the bottom line.

That cynical view might be related to his own arm's-length relationship with Checketts since the Garden boss admitted he lied about meeting with Phil Jackson during the season with regard to replacing Van Gundy. "In the summer, I've learned that your contract is the statement of belief in you, so obviously (Checketts) believes in me," Van Gundy says. "He knows I've done a good job.

"For anybody in this business, you rely on results. I don't care if it's a coach or players or management. The less you try to take things personally, the better off you really are."

Of course, Van Gundy took threats to his job extremely personally. But the strength of his relationship with his core players became evident when they responded to each crisis with a winning streak.

Through it all, Van Gundy kept the blinders on and focused on winning without ever mentioning his precarious circumstances. "He laughed," Childs said. "He was the same person at the end of the season that he was at the beginning of the season."

Van Gundy's facade cracked just enough to reveal the depth of his feelings when Checketts admitted his lie during the Knicks' second-round sweep of Atlanta and the Madison Square Garden crowd responded in a remarkable way by chanting his name in sing-song fashion.

"It certainly is something I'm never going to forget," Van Gundy says. "It was really an unbelievable thing that they would do that. I think it was more than just about me. It was in response to a team they had seen handle adversity well, and I was just one part of that."

No, it simply was the Garden crowd's way of telling Van Gundy that he was their guy.

She knows how to use them...

The Minutewomen will be the second seed in this year's Atlantic 10 Conference championships this weekend at Totman Field.

Kidd and Penny Hardaway. While Penny's point production has been in a downward spiral for four straight seasons, he will finally be given the role he wants for Phoenix, the pure scorer. Kings has the personnel he needs to set Penny free (Clifford Robinson, Tom Gugliotta and Rex Chapman) and the Suns got even deeper by adding big man Rodney Rogers. Which all adds up to Hardaway and Kidd ripping up the West. And hey, maybe we'll even get a comeback from Lil' Penny in the process.

So when the basketball moneymen hit the court for real tonight, try to cut them a little slack. After all, many of these pampered big men are, after all, just trying to fit in.

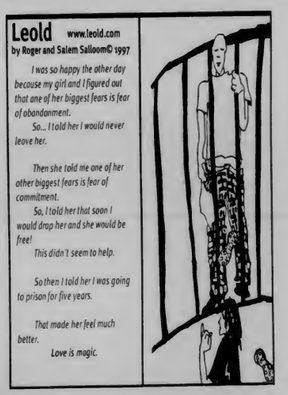
Horoscopes



SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Every effort you make today will be appreciated by those who benefit from them, and you can be sure you'll be asked for a repeat performance.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Similarities are far more interesting to you and others today than differences. It's time to focus on things you and a rival can do together.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – There is no reason to pretend you are fearless today. Doing so could prove dangerous, and you have much to protect at this time.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You may be too interested in showing off in some way today, and you may miss that mark as a result. Get back to the basics as quickly as you can.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You may become involved in a conflict between those who serve and those whom they serve today. It may be up to you to arrange a possible solution.
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You must re-establish contact with someone from afar who was once an important and influential part of your creative team.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Your own sensitivity may get the better of you today, as issues arise which demand a new and increased level of honesty and insight.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – A look back over the past few days and months should reveal to you the answer to a long-asked question which wasn't really that tricky.
CANCER (June 21-July 22) – It's important that you know whether you're dealing with the "real thing" today, or just a clever imitation. Stay sharp!
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – On rare occasions in the past you've enjoyed a clear vision of what lies in store for you in the future. Today, you'll have such an opportunity.
VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You may be quite restless today, and eager to prove yourself in some new fashion. Take care you don't get too far away from your roots at this time.
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You may have trouble justifying some of your own behavior today, particularly in the eyes of someone who is one of your direct superiors.

Hoop heads should cut a little slack to NBA's many misfits

To all the so-called sports experts out there who've spent the last year or so berating the NBA, it's time to 'fess up. You're the same people who sit at home by yourselves and yell at the TV, hounding players who are pulling off moves you could never dream of. You're the same folks who pick up the sports section and rant to no one in particular about stats that don't begin to tell the real roundball story.

Adam White
the NBA

Quite simply, you don't fit in.

But not to worry; you're not alone. When the NBA season officially kicks off today, there will be an invertible All-Star team of players just trying to fit in. Whether it's a new coach and system or a complete change of scenery, these guys will all face the task of squeezing their games and egos into new and exciting scenarios.

Bulls fans can disregard that last part. (Sorry, but I waited a few too many years to be able to say that.) The first place where the misfits will reign supreme is Portland. After pushing San Antonio to the limit in last year's West final, the Blazers inexplicably blew up and transformed into a last stop for aging superstars. Newcomers Scottie Pippen, Steve Smith and Detlef Schrempf have appeared in an unprecedented 11 All-Star games between them, but can they exist together within Mike Dunleavy's system? Or will these "Old Stars" inject a little too much cement into the fast break shoes of Damon Stoudamire, Brian Grant and Rasheed Wallace?

The remodeling job in Portland also changed the face of Atlanta, where essentially the same nucleus had kept the Hawks among the upper echelon of mediocrity for years. The addition of Isaiah Rider will at least inject Lenny Wilkens' lineup with a little excitement, albeit from the suspense of waiting for the guard to screw up. Bimbo Coles brings a locker room presence if little else, but the real upgrade came in the form of Lorenzen Wright. After languishing in basketball hell with the Clippers for three seasons, the 6' 11" Wright will now bring his legitimate big game to the rescue of the aging Dikembe Mutombo. The X-factor in Atlanta could be guard Jim Jackson, who has the ability to put up great numbers but who's production fell off alarmingly in Portland last year.

If the preseason is any indication, rookie two-guard Wally Szczerbiak should have no problem fitting in with Minnesota. The T-Wolves have a sweet forward tandem in Kevin Garnett and Joe Smith, while Terrell Brandon is without a doubt the most underrated point man in the West. That kind of stability gives fifth year coach Flip Saunders the flexibility to let Szczerbiak blossom at his own pace, without leaning too heavily on the No. 6 pick. The Target Center should transform into Wally's world before the season's end.

The fans in our nation's capital would kill for a similar situation. Instead, they have the NCAA Tournament's Most Valuable Player cutting his teeth amongst the league's all-underachieving corps. Richard Hamilton may be a thrilling prospect, but the question is, how much will it hurt Rip's game to have him studying under Mitch Richmond and Juwan Howard? A few seasons in Wizardville, and it's possible that all Hamilton will have learned is how to squeeze the big bucks out of Washington by threatening to take his moves elsewhere.

The one piece of good news facing first year Wizards coach Gar Heard is that new center Ike Austin has dropped some weight and apparently committed himself to justifying his contract. Hey, when Rick Pitino goes out of his way to praise a competitor's fitness, you know that player has made legit strides.

Speaking of strides, one-time place of exile Toronto has suddenly emerged as a hotbed of young hoop heroes. The Raptors have scoring to spare in Doug Christie, Dell Curry and Vince Carter, and picked up the inside Ranger they needed in Indiana castoff Antonio Davis. Davis is a madman on the boards who will finally get the PT he deserves under Butch Carter; his game will also flourish after a few weeks in practice contending with the likes of Charles Oakley and Kevin Willis.

Another squad that underwent a major facelift was Phoenix. Suns fans are drooling, which isn't easy in the Arizona heat, over Danny Ainge's backcourt of Jason

Hasson hits the books; UM rolls over URI in three games

By Seth Szilagyi & James Piehl
Collegian Staff

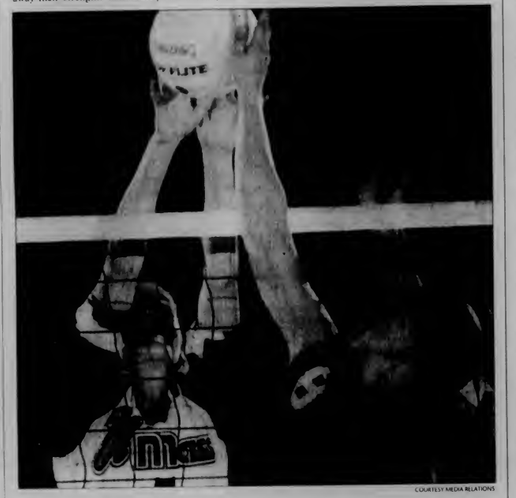
The giant man-baby may have won the round-trip plane tickets at costume night at the Curry Hicks Cage, but no one can argue that the Massachusetts volleyball team wore the best outfit, coming as tenacious defense. Riding on the crest of their defense the Minutewomen swept Rhode Island in three games, 20-18, 15-12, 15-5.

The last thing on the Rams minds when they trotted into town was that their fourth ranked offense in attack percentage in the Atlantic 10 would be disabled by the Minutewomen, who hold the worst kills per game by opponents in the conference with 17.44. However, UM did just that, holding the URI offense to a meager .044 hitting percentage.

Junior Rebecca Hasson went to work, professionally dismantling the Rams offensive powers, tallying a school single-match record of 12 block assists. Hasson also continued to contribute to the offense, registering 5 kills with a hitting percentage of .200.

Sophomore Lymarie Lluvet turned in a career defensive night to aid Hasson and the Minutewomen with 10 block assists of her own, along with 7 kills. Senior Kari Hogancamp was the main offensive force recording a team-high 9 kills and 16 digs defensively. Senior Jill Meyers and sophomore Janeen DeMarte rounded out the strong defensive effort putting 10 and 12 digs, respectively, in the books.

"When our team is that determined, they get the job done. Neither team played well offensively. But we had a few more options offensively and we took away their strengths immediately and it really frustrated them," said head coach Bonnie Kenny. "Defensively, we did what we needed to do and we stayed disciplined. I credit our team for everything they accomplished tonight."



The Minutewomen jumped out to a 9-4 lead to start off game one, before URI gradually cut the lead to tie it at 12-12. After tying it up, the Rams looked to finish off UMass by scoring two straight points to take the lead at 14-12. UM was undaunted rallying to a 15-14 lead on a Rhode Island error. The score continued to flip-flop, as URI pushed the Minutewomen to four ties, before the game ended on a Rhode Island error.

Game two was once again a duel packed with excitement, as UMass pulled out to an early 9-6 advantage. URI never said quit, tying the game up twice at 9-9 and 10-10. The Minutewomen then took the intensity up a notch, only letting up two more points on their way to a game two victory.

Game three saw the Rams completely destruct, hitting a -.114. UM took advantage from the start and the closest URI could get was within two points at 6-4. The Minutewomen only dropped one more point before taking the game in a dominating fashion.

"To win this game you need desire and heart. Tonight we had desire and heart," said Kenny. "We've had a tough couple of weeks. The kids will determine the way the rest of the season goes. We're still way behind, but this puts us were we want to be for the rest of the season. We still need to work on our offense."

The Minutewomen go non-conference when they take on the Connecticut Huskies in Storrs tonight at 7:30 p.m.

Whipple and Co. moving up; Ayi earns top A-10 honors

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

A month ago, the Massachusetts football team wasn't sure where it would be. After falling to Hofstra at home, 27-14, the Minutemen were looking at a 1-3 record heading into a pair of tough road battles. To say the least, UMass was in need of a victory to get back on track.

They got four, and yesterday when The Sports Network released its weekly poll, the Minutemen had climbed to No. 17 in the nation after their 31-9 drubbing of Rhode Island this weekend.

"We are much more relaxed. I think we all felt a lot of pressure early in the season," head coach Mark Whipple said. "Everybody expects us to play the perfect game and that did not happen early. Then you win one great game, and things start happening and you start to feel better about yourself."

The victory over the Rhode Island made it four in a row for the Minutemen, matching the three four-game winning streaks by last year's squad, including the playoff run that ultimately led to a national championship.

With another solid team effort on defense drew more notice of the Atlantic 10. Middle linebacker Kole Ayi led UMass with a game-high 14 tackles, earning him A-10 Defensive Player of the Week honors. It was the seventh time this year that he has led the team in tackles, and it was also the seventh time this season that he has reached double figures in tackles.

Kole Ayi

"If there is a better linebacker in the conference, I have not seen him. I am just glad we only have to block him in practice," Whipple said in Monday's weekly teleconference. "He is a great athlete and a great kid. He has done so much to improve himself. He is a great leader, and he is the core of our front seven."

Last season, the Minutemen needed every win they could get, stumbling into the NCAA Tournament with an 8-3 record. This season, with three losses early, another loss would all but close the door on a postseason berth.

"November is championship month. It all comes down to the next three weeks, and I think we have a legitimate shot," Whipple said. "Hopefully we learned something last year."

UMass travels to Richmond this weekend for a non-conference game at UR Stadium.

UM water polo captures Northern Division crown

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

It wasn't just a good player. Not even simply a senior. Massachusetts men's water polo coach Russ Yarworth had to trudge on without his superstar. The superstar of superstars, two-meter man Brian Stahl.

Unsure of what lied ahead, Yarworth could only scratch his head, wondering where his 11th-ranked Minutemen would be come November.

The answer? Exactly where they left off.

This weekend at Harvard University, Yarworth's troops conquered the field with ease, winning three straight to capture this year's CWPA Northern Division Championship.

The weekend came down to a match with arch-rival St. Francis, who had beaten the Minutemen (25-4 overall, 9-1 ECAC) three out of five times this season. Senior Rich Slingluff scored four goals and Pat Kain added three to lead the Minutemen to a 13-7 victory.

The Terriers came out firing, scoring three early goals, but their offense slowed down at the UM extended their lead. As the lead grew, so did the frustration on St. Francis. UMass' defense buckled down, holding a high-powered Terrier offense to four second half goals when they needed much more. Senior All-American Richard Huntley was strong in net, making 12 saves, much thanks to ill-advised shots on the part of the Terriers.

"A lot of them were frustration shots," Yarworth said. "They have more talent so when they were down, a lot of what they did were individual efforts. A lot of them were rushed."

After falling to Queens College earlier in the season at Wheaton College, the Minutemen regained their composure against the Knights, sending them home with a 6-3 loss. Kain, a Villanova transfer, continued his onslaught, posting three goals to lead the UMass offense. The Minutemen moved their all-time advantage over the Knights up to 20-8, with much of it due to another stellar performance in net by Huntley, a 12-save effort.

"Queens was a good hard-fought game. Both teams were aggressive on defense," Yarworth said. "We have enough talent on offense that if we play hard defense, the goals will come."

To reach the Eastern Championships in Annapolis in two weeks, all the Minutemen needed was a victory over Boston College in the opening round. After disposing of the Eagles with ease, 22-6, early in the season, the Minutemen continued their domination of BC, led by senior Timmy Troupis, whose five goals helped UMass move onto the semifinals with a 14-6 win.

Eight players got on the board for the Minutemen, including Kain who rebounded from a scoreless ECAC championship game against St. Francis for three goals against the Eagles.

"We're probably a little deeper and we play more of a team style," Yarworth said. "We're a lot more balanced and have good senior leadership."

In the Eastern Championship on November 13th and 14th, the Minutemen will see a lot of familiar faces in the pool. Queens' win over Iona in the opening round of the Northern Division Championship gave it a key to Annapolis. Last season, the Knights and Minutemen met in the finals, with the Maroon and White coming out on top thanks to a Slingluff overtime goal, 11-10.

The Minutemen's first round match pits them against George Washington, who have fallen victim to UMass three times this year. The Colonials have yet to find the win column against the Minutemen, but have lost by a total of 10 goals in three games.

"They're always a thorn in our side so we'll have to be ready to go against them," Yarworth said.

Lakers search for identity while Clips move forward

By Mark Heisler
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES – Gee, already?

Another season is upon us and it's going to be a wild one around here, not just because of the new arena.

As usual, one of the local teams is loaded with exciting young players and the other looks confused. Unlike past seasons, however, it's the Clippers who look exciting and the Lakers who look confused.

Of course, it's a little soon to be giving up on the Lakers or depending on Donald T. Sterling to uphold the local honor in professional basketball.

Let's just say, we're in a little different place right now.

Believe this, the Lakers needed what Phil Jackson had: credibility, an air of authority, the ability to introduce them to the grown-up world of competing at the elite level.

Of course, with Jackson came his vision of how the game is played and the triangle, which is a fluid, motion offense, or was until the Lakers got hold of it.

Jackson called it "remedial school," but after several weeks used "autistic," noting their short attention spans, "probably due to too much rap music going in their ears."

This highlighted not only the difficulty of the task but the 12 or so cultural generations between Jackson, 54, and his players, who now may have to widen their musical tastes to include the Grateful Dead or Tommy Dorsey.

If the personnel was ill-fitted to the challenge, Jackson tried to smooth the transition, which is when he began musing about, or hiring, what seemed to be every player who had ever been a Chicago Bull or passed through O'Hare International Airport.

Jackson's habit of musing aloud poses more challenges to the "Laker way." His candor may be refreshing and may oblige Shaquille O'Neal, Kobe

Little Jeffy still looking for respect from NY front office

By Greg Logan
Newsday

NEW YORK – Where is Barry Manilow when you really need him? Maybe the sentimental songwriter could find the words to capture the melange of feelings that nearly tore the New York Knicks apart last season before ultimately bringing them together for their inspiring run to the NBA Finals. Feelings of mistrust and betrayal that finally were overcome by a sense of pride and vindication. Feelings that haven't fully subsided.

Even though the Knicks enter the new season this week as defending Eastern Conference champions, they still are working out their relationships with each other and with coach Jeff Van Gundy, who was either the magician who brought it all together in time to save his job last season or the manipulator who won the internal power struggle with Madison Square Garden president Dave Checketts and deposed general manager Ernie Grunfeld.

On the verge of being fired when the Knicks were 21-21 and on the precipice of missing the playoffs with eight games to go in the lockout season, Van Gundy turned out to be the most elusive target in the corporate jungle. While Grunfeld got the ax from Checketts, the little guy with the pained expression escaped to land a contract extension that guarantees him $14 million over the next four seasons. ,

It was a Darwinian fight for survival if ever there was one, but Van Gundy now says, "I never looked at it that way. Outside appearances might have been that, and maybe it was reality, but I never looked at it like a fight for survival. I looked at it as fighting to get the team right. You have to fight your team all the time to try to do the right things in this league, and last year was the most challenging year I had as far as that. Then we finally got it right with eight games to go in the regular season."

That fight is never-ending. Marcus Camby, whose trade for Van Gundy favorite Charles Oakley was at the root of the tension between the coach and Grunfeld last season, seems to be in the fold now. But Latrell Sprewell, who butted heads with Van Gundy about coming off the bench, is the maverick who missed training camp and who, despite being named a starter and receiving a contract extension, still says his relationship with Van Gundy needs more work.

Van Gundy insists reports of strain between himself and Sprewell are greatly exaggerated by the voracious New York media monster determined to dig up player unrest. "He took coaching very well, and I thought he had a remarkable year, going through everything he went through, being off as long as he was, being hurt, coming to a new team, limited practice time, under great scrutiny," Van Gundy said of Sprewell, who joined the Knicks after serving a one-year suspension for assaulting Golden State coach P.J. Carlesimo at practice. "I would have never bet anybody could have a year as good as he did."

On a professional level, Sprewell says Van Gundy never has verbally abused him in practice the way he says Carlesimo did, and he appreciates Van Gundy's patience with his mistakes. But while he's known for his attack on Carlesimo's authority, Sprewell enjoyed what he considered close personal relationships with his other coaches, Don Nelson, Rick Adelman and Gregg Popovich.

"I think it's important that a coach and a player be somewhat on the same page," Sprewell says. "I know that Jeff has an excellent relationship with Patrick, Larry (Johnson), Chris Childs and Charlie Ward. Myself and Marcus, as newcomers, and Kurt Thomas, he necessarily didn't look at us in that light because we didn't build that trust. We hadn't played for him here.

UM students at mercy of landlords

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

AMHERST - Only a day has passed since 19 University of Massachusetts students received an eviction notice from town building inspectors claiming that their apartment was unsafe and in 24 hours they would be forced to leave.

The 17 men and two women living in apartments 115 and 117 on Northampton Road received an eviction notice Monday morning after a visit from the building inspector cited a cracked foundation and unstable columns that could cause the sides of the building to collapse. In addition, he noticed that the three women living on the top floor of the six-story apartment had no means of escape in the event of a fire.

The once existing fire escape had been destroyed in September, when the remnants of Hurricane Floyd caused a tree branch to crash down upon the porch, tearing the fire escape along with it. Now, all that remains is a set of stairwell dangling in mid air more than 20 feet off the ground.

Rachel Wilder, a senior apparel marketing major, who lives in the building, said in the case of the fire, the three girls have only one mean of escape.

"They're so high up that in the event of a fire, if they couldn't get out their front door, they would all be dead," Wilder said.

The safety concerns were brought before the Amherst Fire Department after one of the student's parents observed the precarious situation and filed a letter of complaint to the fire chief two weeks ago. As a result, Wilder said eight building inspectors showed up at her front door Monday morning to inspect the condition of the building. After a half hour passed, they turned to her and told her that all occupants would be forced to leave within 24 to 48 hours.

In addition to the faulty fire escape, the inspectors declared that the building was laying on a fractured foundation and that the sides of the house could collapse if the columns were to give way.

Wilder said she was unaware that anything was structurally unstable with the building and if she had been informed of it earlier, she said she would never have rented the apartment at the beginning of the semester.

On Monday, Wilder contacted University Legal Services and lawyer Thomas Coisch. Wilder said he told them they didn't have to leave because the town of Amherst was responsible in finding them temporary housing. However, when Coisch spoke with town officials, they didn't agree. Wilder said they arrived at the conclusion that the residents could have more time. Coisch couldn't be reached for comment.

Yesterday, they were notified by phone that the evacuation premises had been changed, and that if they chose, they could remain in the building for four to six weeks. However, the town is still advising them to leave, but Wilder said they refuse to go.

"The town is advising us to leave, but they can't because we have no other place to go," Wilder said. "This has become the biggest headache that all of us have had to deal with."

According to her, Coisch has spoken with their landlord, Gary Cook, and Wilder said he is reassuring them that the building hazards will be cared for and fixed.

Cook would not comment on the situation.

However, Wilder said as a landlord, Cook has known about the decrepit structuring and has refused to do anything about it for the past three months.

"He's known about this since the hurricane and it took one of his tenants' parents writing a letter to the fire chief to get him on the ball with this," Wilder said.

And she believes that this kind of inattention for tenant safety is occurring in other apartments around Amherst.

"This is probably one out of many in the town of Amherst that are unsafe and nothing is being done about them," Wilder said. "It takes an incident or complaint to open their eyes to the problem."

In the meantime, Kara Drobnis, senior family and consumer studies major and Denise Patterson, senior apparel marketing major must sleep on the top floor of the building with the realization that they are unsafe. Wilder hopes to donate her time to educating people about what's going on.

"People need to be aware of who they're renting from and the condition of the building so that something like this doesn't happen again," Wilder said.

UHS to treat dorm residents after BM scare

Tonight, in the second floor main lounge of Patterson Residence Hall in the Southwest Residential Area, nurses from University Health Services will be treating dorm residents for possible cases of meningitis.

The treatment, Ciprofloxin, is given to individuals who may have been in contact with forms of meningitis. University Health Services is asking that all residents of Patterson Residence Hall come to the lounge between 7:30 and 10 p.m. Nurses will be available to provide information to all residents at that time.

On Sunday, a first-year female student from West Newton was diagnosed with bacterial meningitis and is now being treated at Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

Common symptoms of meningitis include a stiff neck, headaches, high temperatures, having a hard time waking up, confusion and exhaustion.

HC tries to raise awareness of Ft. Benning training facility

By Jason Spears
Collegian Staff

This month, the Hampshire College Human Rights Group will be sponsoring two events centered on the School of Americas. The first will raise awareness about the group, while the second will build support for a trip to participate in this year's protest against the Georgia institution.

The School of Americas, located in Fort Benning, Ga., has been implicated in the training of foreign nationals in techniques of terror in order to promote democracy. Many of the graduates have been accused of committing killings in Central and Latin America. Activists have been holding an annual protest at Fort Benning during November in order to shut down the school.

Tomorrow there will be a screening of a short video, followed by an open dialogue with Ann Tiffany and Ed Kinane, two prominent Latin American activists, at 7:30 p.m. in the main lecture hall of Franklin Patterson Hall at Hampshire College. The 16-minute video will be Crossing the Line, narrated by Susan Sarandon. The video documents last year's protest procession into Fort Benning, which was the largest civil disobedience action in the United States since the Vietnam War-era protests.

Tiffany was active in the Sanctuary movement of the 1980s, and in 1993 worked with the Peace Brigades International to protect activists in Haiti against death squads whose leaders were trained at Fort Benning. In her efforts to close down the School of Americas, Tiffany has fasted, marched, lobbied, written articles, been arrested and spent six months in Danbury Prison. Tiffany is an alumna of Mount Holyoke College.

Kinane has worked with the Peace Brigades International to protect human rights workers against death squads in Haiti, Guatemala and El Salvador. He has fasted for 40 days on the steps of the U.S. Capitol to call Congress's attention to the School of Americas. He spent two months in federal prison in 1996 and another year in prison more recently for protesting at the main gate of the School of Americas.

On Nov. 9, activist David Clark will be screening the film A Place Called Chiapas. A discussion will follow the screening. Clark is an activist who spent three months in Chiapas as a human rights observer through Peace Brigades International. The screening and discussion will begin at 7 p.m. at the main lecture hall in Franklin Patterson Hall.

A group of five-college students will take part in this year's protest at Fort Benning to culminate the series of events surrounding the School of Americas. The protest is expected to attract several thousand protesters. The Hampshire College Human Rights Group is organizing the trip, and will provide a bus to Fort Benning. The trip leaves the morning of Nov. 19 and returns Nov. 22.

Janice Healy from the Attorney General's office spoke at a panel discussion last night as a part of Hate Crimes Awareness Week.

Panel defines what makes hate a crime

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

As part of Hate Crime Awareness Week at the University of Massachusetts, a legal panel discussion held last night explained what constitutes a hate crime.

A hate crime is an offense to a person or property intimidating that person because of his or her race, color, creed, religion, ancestry, gender, sexual orientation, physical or mental disability or national origin. These are crimes that affect the entire community, and crimes that need responses from the entire community, according to the discussion.

Last night's panel consisted of Janice Healy and John Woodruff from the Attorney General's office of Western Massachusetts, Steven Greenbaum, Assistant District Attorney Northwestern District and John Luippold, Police Chief of the University of Massachusetts police department.

The discussion opened with Luippold explaining recent statutes that make investigating crimes of this nature not only a learned process, but also one that involves continued learning for the police department. He said officers are trained to respond in a serious manner, which will enable them to provide support to the victim and community as well as find the information needed to resolve such incidents.

Luippold said the residents of Gorman Residence Hall should be commended for the manner in which they handled the situation of graffiti in their dorm. In mid-September, racial and sexist graffiti was reportedly written on three floors of the residence hall. In response to the graffiti, Gorman residents held a forum to discuss solutions for dealing with discrimination on campus. Luippold praised the residents for taking action and conveying the message that they were not going to tolerate hate crimes.

"One should not have to worry about being singled out," Luippold said. "I would like the entire community to come to a point where they won't put up with these types of crimes that they can't be done here, we won't tolerate it."

All of the panelists encouraged students to report incidents, saying that it is important to take action against offensive behavior.

What defines a hate crime is the motivation behind the action or words. A person should feel safe in all situations. Even if an incident does not fit into a criminal suit, it could be a case of a violation of a person's civil or secure rights.

Determining whether a crime is considered to be hate-related is a case-by-case process, Greenbaum said, and the final decision is left to the jury and or judge.

"The laws alone are complex and can be unclear, but the police department works to clarify any issues in the investigation process," Woodruff said. Each case is considered at both levels, civil and criminal, to determine what actions can be taken.

The hardest part is that there are many gray areas with crimes that involve hatred. Healy pointed out that there is the issue of first amendment rights, especially when dealing with group protests that may also offend individuals. In order for such actions to be considered a civil rights violation, there must be some form of intimidation and/or threat, and there has to be biased motivation. If an action doesn't meet these criteria, the offender is covered under freedom of speech laws.

Woodruff said the Attorney General's office is working towards furthering education on the definition of hate crimes. He said education is extremely important, especially for the youth.

"A lot of these crimes reported are committed by young people, even under the age of 19," Woodruff said.

The Hate Crimes Taskforce is specifically working on an education program that will reach all levels of schooling.

UMPD reports only two arrests in holiday haul

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

Only two people were arrested last weekend in what University of Massachusetts Police Chief John Luippold called a quiet weekend.

"Historically, and this may be dating me, Halloween has been a busy weekend for us, and to be honest," Luippold said, "we were expecting a much bigger weekend than we really got."

Two University students were arrested this weekend and charged with possession of alcohol by a minor. Mark Cardarelli, a 19-year-old sophomore from Westwood majoring in exercise science, and Spencer Worthington Brennan, also a 19-year-old Westwood resident, were arrested on Friday night.

Weekend Police Roundup

There were other violations this weekend, including at least nine related to liquor laws. Three of the violations involved the individuals being show-caused.

"The show cause is really a time saving device," Luippold said. "We will show cause a person rather than harge them because perhaps the officers are out on patrol or need to be somewhere."

According to Luippold, a show cause will force a person to come to court to face charges filed after the incident in question. A show cause can cause the court to issue a criminal complaint and once the person has a criminal complaint, they must answer to questions. However, show causes are only issued for misdemeanors. They are not issued for felonies, and in a case of a felony, a criminal complaint can be issued without the show cause.

Aside from the actual weekend violations, there was a fire in Brown Residence Hall in the Sylvan Residential Area on Sunday. Officers reported to a call at 4:46 a.m. and spoke to the reporting individual.

"There were reports of flames in the laundry room," Luippold said. "A sheet had caught fire and the reporting party reported smoke."

Regarding the Halloween weekend Luippold said that last year, there were three reports of vandalism and four reported larcenies. This year there were six reports of vandalism and 10 reports of larceny. Luippold, however, pointed out one fact of last year.

"Last year we had the shooting in Sylvan on the Halloween weekend," Luippold said. A student was shot on October 30, 1998, in Cashin Residence Hall. Sokha Doe Chhim was charged in the shooting.

The weekend, beyond that, was fairly quiet, according to Luippold, but on Monday, a pedestrian was hit by a passing vehicle.

"We are looking for someone driving a gold Honda Accord or anyone with any information," Luippold said.

On Monday, Andrew Vernon of Stockbridge received bruises to his hand and leg at 9:08 a.m. He was taken to University Health Services. Vernon was crossing Commonwealth Avenue by the Physical Plant when he was struck. The operator of the vehicle asked after Vernon's well-being and then left the area.

Yesterday morning, Donald Prouty III, 18, of Wheelwright, was arrested and charged with violation of a restraining order.

"We received a report that Prouty had violated his restraining order by attempting to contact family members of the victim," Luippold said. "He also tried to contact the victim."

According to Luippold, the Ware Police Department arrested Prouty and the UMPD picked him up and brought him back to UMass to face charges.

"He went to court and could certainly face jail time," Luippold said.

EgyptAir disaster was airline's first since 1986

By Howard Schneider
Washington Post

CAIRO – This is not a city where safety and foresight rule. Buildings collapse with regularity. Drivers jockey recklessly through the streets.

But EgyptAir has been a presence as sturdily dependable in its way as the Nile floods that built Egyptian civilization.

It isn't a flashy airline. Complaints about service are common, and it's frequently the object of jokes, such as those resulting from recent spate of incidents in which passengers dozed through stops and wound up in the wrong country. But, like the national carriers operating even in economically marginal countries such as Yemen, or small ones such as Qatar, its planes arrive where they are scheduled.

Yet if the loss of Flight 990, which crashed early Sunday off the New England coast, turns out to be an accident, questions will undoubtedly be raised about EgyptAir. The airline has a spotty safety record, especially in the 1970s, though it has improved since the airline stopped flying Russian-made jets acquired when Egypt had a strong relationship with the former Soviet Union. It now has a fleet of nearly 40 Boeing and Airbus jets, most of them built in the early 1990s, according to Airclaims Ltd., a London firm.

EgyptAir has often been the target of hijackers. In 1985, 60 passengers and two crew members were killed in a botched attempt by Egyptian commandos to end a hijacking of a Boeing 737 jet. Just two weeks ago, on Oct. 19, an Egyptian commandeered an EgyptAir flight between Istanbul and Cairo. He apparently poked a pen into the neck of a crew member and forced the plane to fly to Germany, where he was overpowered and detained. None of the 46 passengers was harmed, but the airline was criticized for sloppy security.

Sunday's crash was the first fatal accident for the airline since a Fokker 27 propeller plane of its Air Sinai subsidiary crashed in 1986 at Cairo International Airport, killing 23 people.

But EgyptAir has had a series of nonfatal accidents in recent years. In March, for instance, an Airbus 321 jet overshot a landing, stopping beyond the end of a runway; last year, another Airbus jet was substantially damaged when it collided with an Ethiopian jet while taxiing in Cairo.

Egyptian Chairman Mohammed Fahim Rayan has acknowledged mistakes in the 67-year-old airline's operations and promised better service.

Egyptian aviation regulators say they watch EgyptAir and other airlines closely and strive to adhere to world maintenance and safety standards.

"We are in very good shape with oversight, and we do it with [international] regulations and modernized it with FAA [Federal Aviation Administration] assistance," said Capt. Cato Fatah, chairman of the Egyptian Civil Aviation Authority. "We have been flying to the United States for 15 years with no problem."

He said maintenance personnel for the airline's Boeing fleet start their training at company facilities in the United States, and Boeing representatives work full time with EgyptAir to help ensure the planes are properly maintained.

In 1986, shortly before the FAA was to evaluate Egyptian aviation oversight as part of an international assessment program, the Egyptians hired a unit of Mitre Corp. of McLean, Va., for help in modernizing its air traffic system and aviation safety inspections, said Amr ElSawy, senior vice president at Mitre. ElSawy said the Center for Advanced Aviation System Development helped the Egyptians ensure the procedures were in place to pass the FAA inspection and another by the International Civil Aviation Organization, an arm of the United Nations.

"A lot of nations had to go through a strict process of dotting I's and crossing T's," ElSawy said. "My guess is not everything was in place at the time."

The FAA rated Egypt as a category 1 country, meaning its oversight met international standards and Egyptian carriers could continue flying to the United States.

Disney and China announce plan for new theme park

By Henry Chu
Los Angeles Times

HONG KONG – Walt Disney Co. and the Hong Kong government announced a long-awaited deal yesterday to build a theme park in this bustling financial hub, an agreement that would give Asia its second Magic Kingdom and grant Disney access to millions of Chinese customers.

Negotiators went down to the wire Monday to hammer out a $2.75 billion deal that would make Disney and Hong Kong joint partners in developing a 311.2-acre entertainment complex on Lantau Island, a lush, sparsely populated area west of Hong Kong proper.

Plans call for the Hong Kong government to provide a massive $2.14 billion in government loans, land and infrastructure improvements in exchange for a 57 percent equity stake in the project. Disney would invest $318 million to build the complex, which would include a Disneyland, two or three resort hotels, shops and restaurants. About $500 million in commercial loans would make up the difference.

The complex would be the biggest development project undertaken by Hong Kong since the former British colony returned to Chinese control two years ago. Battered by a lingering recession and the Asian financial crisis, many Hong Kong residents view the proposed Magic Kingdom as a magic bullet to get the economy going again.

The Hong Kong park would be larger than Tokyo's nearly 200-acres, but much smaller than the 1,500-acre EuroDisney.

"This world class development will mark the beginning of a new era for Hong Kong," said Hong Kong Chief Executive Tung Chee-hwa. Tung said that the deal represented "a vote of confidence in our city, in our future."

Weary from months of haggling, Disney executives spent yesterday morning briefing Hong Kong's executive council and legislature, both of which must approve the deal. Although some activists and analysts have expressed reservations about the financial and environmental impact, observers expect the project to win official sanction handily.

Public support for locating Disney's third overseas park here, after Tokyo and Paris, has run high ever since Tung raised the possibility earlier this year.

But analysts caution that the park, to be opened in 2005, will take years to recoup its initial outlay. And a few opponents criticized the government for rushing to import Mickey Mouse rather than cultivating a home-grown product that better reflects Hong Kong's own culture and heritage.

"It would be a pirated copy of the Magic Kingdom," lamented Mei Ng, director of Friends of the Earth, an environmental group. "Why do we have to be like everybody else?"

Disney's representatives have striven to show themselves to be sensitive to local concerns. They are mindful of the buzz saw of problems they ran into in selling EuroDisney to the French, who saw the park's no-alcohol policy and other supposedly wholesome traits as examples of American cultural imperialism.

In the plans unveiled yesterday, Disney executives said that the focus of the park would be firmly on the Disney franchise and Disney's stable of well-known characters, but that the company would be open to recommendations on how to make shops and restaurants appeal to Chinese sensibilities.

With good reason: Disney and Hong Kong are counting on mainland China to provide a large share of the 5 million to 10 million annual visitors. Immigration authorities have already begun drafting plans to offer one- or two-day visas specifically tailored for mainland Chinese tourists.

Violence against Jews in Israel on rise

By Rebecca Trounson
Los Angeles Times

UMM AL-FAHM, Israel – Sheik Raed Salah, a hardline leader of Israel's Islamic Movement, chooses his words with care when he speaks of recent evidence that Israeli Arabs are involved in attacks against Jews.

Israel's long history of discrimination against its Arab citizens "is not a justification for violence," said Salah, the mayor of this scruffy Israeli Arab town –and the object of intensive new scrutiny by a government that says it has no choice but to act against extremists within Israel's own borders.

Nonetheless, Salah said, for some Arabs in Israel, "the oppression and discrimination they suffer create feelings that may result in such extraordinary actions." He offered no condemnation of those moved to violence.

Israeli officials claim, in fact, that Salah himself has helped foster a bitter, anti-Jewish atmosphere that may have inspired recent attacks or attempted attacks by young Arabs with links to his movement.

The sudden upsurge in violence by Israeli Arabs, including a pair of botched car bombings and the slayings of two Jewish hikers in recent weeks, has shocked Israeli Jews and Arabs alike, creating feelings of vulnerability in each community.

For Jews, who often associate politically motivated attacks with Palestinians, it has raised fears of a violent fifth column within Israel's million-strong Arab citizenry. Israeli Arabs, who now make up a sixth of the state's population, remained on their land when Israel was created in 1948. Unlike Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, they vote in Israeli elections and attend Israeli schools.

Israeli Arabs, meanwhile, fear that recent steps taken by the government to increase official monitoring of the Islamic Movement, its publications, leaders and funding mark a return to the oppressive measures of the past, when Arab citizens lived under Israeli military rule from 1948 to 1966. Many insist that those who carried out the violence were acting on their own, apart from any organized movement in Israel.

"I am afraid that Israel is trying to take action against all Arabs under cover of these measures against the Islamic Movement," said Mahmoud Attiyeh, 66, a retired construction worker in Umm al Fahm, southeast of Haifa. "This is not the way of democracy."

But Israeli officials say they have growing evidence that the recent attacks were inspired by the Islamic Movement and coordinated with the militant Palestinian group Hamas.

Hamas, with headquarters in Palestinian-ruled Gaza and the Syrian capital, Damascus, is violently opposed to the Middle East peace process and has carried out dozens of attacks in Israel. Israeli officials say the group has recently increased its recruiting efforts among Israeli Arabs, who can travel freely throughout the state, unlike Palestinians from Gaza and the West Bank.

"We are not declaring war on Israeli Arabs or the Islamic Movement," Internal Security Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami said. "But we cannot ignore the fact that the bombing attempts coincided with the relaunching of the peace process. We believe that Hamas is trying to act by proxy in Israel, and we have to protect ourselves."

In its announcement in late September, the government said it would intensify scrutiny of the movement, from closer monitoring of its funding and institutions to the Friday sermons delivered by its preachers. But it turned down recommendations from police and the Shin Bet security service for a harsher crackdown.

Ben-Ami said he had argued against the tougher proposals, including travel restrictions on the movement's leaders and closure of its newspapers, out of concern that such a crackdown could create anger that might propel more Israeli Arabs toward the fundamentalist group.

"We wanted to be as precise as possible, to take a sort of X-ray and see to what extent we could pinpoint the link between this movement and anti-state or terrorist activities," Ben-Ami said. "We also want to say to people that there are certain red lines, that you can criticize the government or the state of Israel, but you cannot pass these lines and become an operational ally of the Hamas."

Officially, the police and Shin Bet said they were satisfied with the government's decisions, but some within both forces were privately critical, arguing that the measures did not go far enough and had little value.

Members of the Islamic Movement and many other prominent Israeli Arabs objected nonetheless.

"If there are crimes committed, then those who commit them should be punished," argued Hashem Mahameed, an Israeli Arab member of Parliament who is affiliated with but not a member of the Islamic Movement. "But taking action against any collective is very dangerous. You risk making everyone in this movement an enemy against the state of Israel."

Although it also produces highly intellectual programs seen on over 500 television stations and a general intellectual magazine that is read across the country, MSL's main focus is on teaching you the practical skills you need for success in law, business and government. We teach you to analyze legal, business and human problems, uncover facts and organize them logically, write well, be persuasive both orally and in writing, negotiate, arbitrate and mediate, try cases, and write specialized legal documents. And at MSL, you will be taught by experts who regularly practice these skills.

The non-specialized skills that we teach you, such as the ability to analyze problems, amass and organize facts, and write and speak persuasively, are needed not only in law, but are greatly desired in business.

MSL teaches you all these crucial skills at a tuition that is by far the lowest of any law school in New England – about half of the median tuition elsewhere in New England. The following chart of full-time tuitions illustrates this:

Clinton, Mideast leaders pay tribute to Rabin

By Edwin Chen and Tracy Wilkinson
Los Angeles Times

OSLO, Norway – President Clinton and the leaders of Israel and the Palestinians paid stirring tribute Tuesday to the memory of slain Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, and then renewed their commitment to making peace in the Middle East in a matter of months.

In the city where the peace process began more than six years ago, Clinton clasped hands with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat and told them to "finish the job" started by Rabin.

The two Middle Eastern leaders promised a schedule of frequent consultations and intense negotiations. But no concrete progress was reported in Oslo toward bridging the enormous gaps that continue to drive the two sides apart.

The three leaders met for about an hour Tuesday night, capping a two-day summit that revolved around elaborate ceremonies honoring the spirit of Rabin, whose decision to embrace the landmark Oslo accords of 1993 cost him his life.

"I feel that we have revitalized the peace process," Clinton said.

The largely symbolic gathering provided another high-level push to a peace process poised to enter its most difficult and critical phase.

Clinton, emerging from his final session with Barak and Arafat, said the next round of talks dedicated to the final and most contentious issues – from the status of the coveted holy city of Jerusalem to the fate of 3 million Palestinian refugees – had been launched in a refreshingly positive atmosphere.

"The framework talks are off to a very good start," Clinton said.

Clinton said another summit patterned after the 1978 Camp David meetings may be in the offing.

"They have agreed with me that we might well have a summit at the end of this process when progress has been made," Clinton said. "I believe that in good faith we will get an agreement and a summit."

Less than four months after taking office, Barak has pledged, with Arafat's concurrence, to reach a framework agreement – essentially a blueprint for how to resolve the outstanding issues by mid-February, and a final treaty by September.

A senior Clinton administration official, speaking later to reporters, hailed a "new spirit" from the Israeli and Palestinian camps.

The Oslo summit was "an event that has infused all sides with a renewed spirit, a renewed dedication and a renewed awareness of the stakes," the U.S. official said. "Neither side has any illusions about what they're entering," and both are fully aware that "none of the permanent-status issues are easy issues."

It was widely reported Tuesday in Israel that Barak had presented Clinton with a detailed outline of how he envisions resolving the final disputed issues. The prime minister told Clinton that Israel would recognize a Palestinian "entity" in nearly half of the West Bank and would agree to the evacuation of many of the Jewish settlements that have sprouted up across the West Bank according to Israeli correspondents traveling with Barak.

Earlier in the day, the search for peace focused on the man who was one of its earliest patrons. At the ornate Oslo City Hall where Rabin was presented with the Nobel Peace Prize for his role in forging and accepting the original accords, Israelis, Palestinians, Americans and Europeans came together to make impassioned pleas for a definitive peace. Among them were leaders, officials, relatives and former associates of Rabin, as well as families of war victims, musicians and writers.

Nation's 565 airports cleared for Y2K flight

By Stephen Barr
Washington Post

WASHINGTON – None of the nation's 565 airports regulated by the Federal Aviation Administration have reported Year 2000 computer problems that would pose safety or security risks on Jan. 1, according to a Transportation Department announcement yesterday.

The FAA has visited or interviewed officials at each airport to determine if they have adequate Y2K plans for computerized operations, such as airfield lighting, radio communications, fire dispatch and locks on doors to restricted areas.

FAA officials did not verify if Y2K fixes actually had been made but looked at whether the airports' plans were appropriate for their operations. About half the airports, for example, don't rely on computerized systems to control access to airliner ramps and other sensitive parts of airports.

Today, the FAA will publish a rule requiring airports to conduct a "readiness check" of their computer systems shortly after beginning operations in the new year, Louise Mallet, the FAA's acting associate administrator for airports, said this week.

For busy airports, the Y2K doublecheck will likely come in the early hours of Jan. 1, shortly after computers should be interpreting "00" as the year 2000.

Federal officials and computer specialists fear that some governmental, commercial and private computers, as well as some embedded computer chips, may interpret "00" as 1900 instead, and shut down or otherwise malfunction.

Yesterday, the Transportation Department posted information on airport readiness at its Web site (www.fly2k.dot.gov). Around Nov. 16, the FAA plans to post Y2K information for more than 3,000 U.S. air carriers offering passenger service.

Last month, about 1,300 carriers hadn't responded to FAA requests for Y2K information, prompting a concerned Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, D-Conn., to publish their names in the Congressional Record. He also attached a provision to a pending FAA authorization bill that would give the government the authority to withdraw aviation licenses if carriers did not respond to Y2K queries.

Dean's submission for Va. song sizzles

By Michael Leahy
Washington Post

There's a commonwealth of beauty known to man
As the mother of the fathers of our country
Heaven chose her as the birthplace of our land

Donna Dean penned the lyrics in the midst of a migraine attack, a story that makes her rivals snicker but one she'll recount for whoever wants to listen. There she was in bed one night with a migraine when, inspired, she got up, went into her bathroom, sat down and took about a half-hour to scribble the 12 lines that became "Virginia." Jimmy adapted the music from a song he'd recently written.

"As an anthem for Virginia, it's the best, no doubt. If you hear it one time, you'll be humming it everywhere," Jimmy said over the phone one afternoon.

Donna chirped in: "You sure will. It's sing-along-able. It's got real good singability."

"Singability" is a Donna Dean word.

"All my life, I've tried to be part of songs with singability," she said. "It's much harder than people realize to write a sing-along-able song."

Del. James K. "Jay" O'Brien Jr., R-Fairfax, couldn't agree more. Appointed to the 12-member state song panel, O'Brien soon was drowning in tapes sent in by hopefuls. "I'd play five at a time on my car's cassette deck with my kids screaming in the back seat," O'Brien recalled. "I'd play five bars [and] my kids would be shouting, 'That stinks!'

"I'll tell you part of why this controversy so worries me," O'Brien added. "I'm afraid of anything that might make me have to listen to those songs again. My kids couldn't take it."

Virginia's former state song, "Carry Me Back to Old Virginia," seemed, remarkably, to both bore and offend. Its only truly memorable characteristic was that it romanticized slavery, said its critics, who made clear they didn't want anyone carrying them back anywhere.

It was put to pasture in 1997 with the title of "state song emeritus," and the search was on for a new song. Even before the competition was announced, though, the Deans' song was being promoted by Martin and Del. Franklin P. Hall, D-Richmond, both of whom wound up on the song subcommittee, opening the door to charges of bias.

Four-course ease

When I was 12, I went to Oxford, England with my dad. While there, I bought a bookmark with a cute little inscription on it: "The more you study, the more you know. The more you know, the more you forget. The more you forget, the less you know. So why study?"

My first impression of the meaning of the quote was, "The more hours you study, the more you know." However, I reinterpreted the quote when I heard about the proposal that came before the faculty senate at a meeting a few weeks ago. The proposal advocates for a four-course load per semester, rather than the current five-course load, an idea that I have thought made sense since I was a freshman. Perhaps taking too many classes in a semester is an impediment to really learning the material being taught.

Alexis Pushkar

Why do I think a four-course semester is a good idea? Well, for starters, I have earned my three highest semester GPAs during four-class semesters. I freely admit that there could be other reasons why, but I do believe that I was more organized and completed more of the required work on my classes during those semesters. In addition, I was able to take on other activities. Being a Resident Assistant and being an editor and writer at the Collegian has taught me skills that will be far more useful in my soon-to-be-chosen career path than the ability to spit out useless facts about Ibsen plays or frog anatomy. Instead I have learned practical communication skills, both in speaking and in writing.

But a better GPA is not the only good reason why we should change to a four-course semester. Professors would be able to delve even more deeply into topics in their field of interest. Students could spend more time on assigned work in each class because they would be more focused, having one less class to worry about. Time is gained both in having one less class to attend and one less lump of information to process. Personally, I find five, six, or seven class semesters to be an endless treadmill where some weeks are spent cramming in one subject while others are neglected only to have to cram for those neglected classes the next week. Each class develops an endless cycle of cramming and neglecting and cramming and neglecting until the end of the semester arrives, and my head is spinning.

When the end of the semester rolled around for the semesters that I took five or six or seven classes, I was screwed because the UMass final exam schedule is ludicrous. We have two days to prepare for exams between the last day of classes and the first day of exams. Taking five final exams in a couple of days with only a couple of days to prepare for them is nuts. I lost a well-earned A in a class because I couldn't keep up with the final exam schedule involved in a five-class semester. And the professor, who didn't know me from Adam (or Eve), wasn't interested in considering that my exam grade was obviously way out of line with the rest of my performance in the class, even after pledging to the whole class at the beginning of the semester that he would do.

Perhaps if the class had been smaller, I might have had a better relationship with that professor, and he might have cut me a little slack because my grade was on the border. If students were taking fewer classes and the number of professors and TAs remained constant, class sizes would decrease. I tend to pay more attention in smaller classes because the professor can see me if I fall asleep or read the Collegian (not that anyone ever does that.) I pay more attention because professors can make more eye contact with me, and eye contact engages me in learning. And if I know the professor is looking at me during class, I won't feel like a complete stranger when I show up at office hours.

Another reason for a shift to smaller classes is PR. UMass invests a lot of time and money in public relations efforts, trying to make this school look good to parents and prospective students. Smaller classes at a university this size could make some people take another look at this school.

Unfortunately, one of the major problems with the idea of a four-course semester is that this university has a wide range of classes offered and cutting down the number of classes that students take cuts down on the breadth of a student's education. While classes would be smaller and students would be able to focus more on the classes that they do take each semester, the average student would be taking eight fewer classes over four years here. That drastically reduces the breadth of education UMass grads would attain.

One of the advantages of studying at a university is the tremendous number of classes offered, and UMass really has some exceptional offerings. Many small colleges expect their students to only take four classes per semester because the workload is heavy in each class and there are fewer classes offered. My best friend goes to Holy Cross College in Worcester, a school that is a lot smaller than UMass. She never had the opportunity to take a fraction of the classes that I had the opportunity to take. However, other universities with many class offerings like Princeton and Michigan tell their students to take only four classes per semester because of the amount of work involved in each class.

As someone who relishes the opportunity to study many different disciplines, the idea of taking eight fewer classes kills me. And yet the benefits from my four-course semesters were so worthwhile. I have to admit that I still side with the four-course semesters would force students to choose their classes more carefully. I have definitely taken classes that I probably shouldn't have because they ended up being a waste of time. If I were to do it over again, I would choose more carefully.

Opponents of the four-course semester should remember that students still will be able to overload and take more than four classes. Currently, there are many students who take more than five classes each semester. Under a four-course system, we could still do the same. The amount of work would be onerous, but I know plenty of people who could take that on for one or two semesters, although probably not all eight semesters.

Implementation of this plan would require a major overhauling of the curriculum in many departments. Currently, curricula should be overhauled frequently anyway, to meet the changing needs of students and the work force. Because GenEds are in the process of being overhauled, it is a good time to consider other ways in which we can change our curricula to better educate students and possibly keep them from having nervous breakdowns. Even a five-course semester can be grueling and at the end I can't help but think, "The more subjects I study in one semester, the more I know but the more frantic my life and schedule become. The more frantic my life and schedule become, the more I forget. The more I forget, the less I know. So what's the point?"

Writing a wrong

Preface: This lesson will likely require a calculator, but I can assure you that it has little to do with math.

Lecture: Where to begin? I'm not usually one to preach.

Well, when I was in seventh-grade, my Holyoke Youth soccer coach – a man with a serious military background – made our team run for a much longer period of time than I was accustomed to. Seth Schnitzer and I vomited. That's got to be worth at least $1.6 million, right? Physical abuse?

Just five months before that, I was moving up to Midget League baseball as an All-Star first baseman from the Pee-Wee League. I was benched in favor of Jerome Tardy. However, curricula should be overhauled frequently anyway, to meet the because I was too stubborn to subscribe to a coaching style that clashed with my expectations.

But I am not entitled to any money. Certainly not millions of dollars.

And these allegations that I've just made, well... they could be construed in a variety of ways. If I were to file a multi-million dollar lawsuit, however frivolous that may be, everything would suddenly become serious. People would be calling for those coaches' heads before the coaches even had an opportunity to explain themselves... which they obviously couldn't do because they would have to remain silent in lieu of the pending lawsuit.

And maybe, just maybe, those coaches wouldn't want to explain themselves in the first place because maybe, just maybe, they were trying to protect me from any embarrassment. For all I know, I could have been caught breaking some potentially humiliating team rules.

Although I'm still convinced that none of those coaches ever really liked me, I'd have to look at their intentions before I'd decide to visit the Law Offices of Mark E. Salamone, or John Haymond, or Allan R. Goodman, or any other ambulance chaser for that matter.

As much as some of my coaches may have made my life miserable, their intent was to make me a better athlete – dare I say "a winner?" Coaches are allowed to play mind games with athletes.

If you don't believe me, I'll play devils advocate. No, coaches cannot play mind games. The psyche of a child is fragile.

Well, I agree that children are fragile, but if they're not taught courage, discipline, and responsibility, they may as well remain children for the rest of their lives.

A little adversity never killed anyone. How much adversity do athletes actually endure in their careers? To determine this I would have to take into account the character of each athlete in order to assess the credibility of the complaints that they make against their coaches.

If I were truly traumatized by a coach, and had any character, I would take legal action only to have him/her fired, so that other athletes do not have to endure what I had to endure. The dollar signs would not be dancing in my head. Seeking a hefty sum of money would not right the wrong. Because I am a male, these issues would probably be laughed out of court.

You didn't hear anything about injury-prone Indiana Pacers center Rik Smits suing his coach Larry Bird, who sarcastically commented: "... If Rik Smits played 48 minutes (as a tough player should), he'd be out for two years."

How about the cussing that former UMass basketball coach John Calipari directed towards his players? He didn't think the psyches of his players were fragile. Imagine Calipari saying, "Hey, fellas, I'd really like you to play hard so maybe we can make the Final Four, but that's not our goal. Our goal is that you're all happy."

Consider the armed forces. How do they differ from student athletics? Both pay for the student's education in return for a definite tour of duty (four years of playing on a sports team or three years of military service). Imagine what would happen if drill instructors were not allowed to play mind games?

We are not forced to play collegiate sports, nor are we forced to serve Uncle Sam. People who choose to play sports in college, must understand that everyone does not respond the same way to the same orders. Some need the proverbial kick in the ass, some don't. Some succeed, some fail.

A few insults, a few jerks of my arm, and quite a few games on the bench never did me any serious harm... at least not enough to warrant serious civil action. Why would I ruin another life because I'm not happy with my life, and the choices I have made?

If I did, I couldn't be writing the wrong.

Cardboard politicians

At a rally on Capitol Hill last month, pro-gun lawmakers stood next to cardboard cutouts of police officers to symbolize that the real cops were out on the street fighting crime. Down the street, at a White House reception the same day, the anti-gun liberals should have brought cardboard cutouts of the politicians in attendance.

There is no question that their paper stand-ins could have come up with a better solution to end gun violence in America.

With their polished white teeth contorted into eerie smiles, liberal policy makers stood behind Clinton and applauded his latest brilliant idea. He announced a $15 million Federal gun buy-back program that will target America's most impoverished inner city housing projects. Individuals from the projects can bring in their guns in exchange for a quick fifty bucks, or for the lucky ones, $100 in coveted McDonald's coupons.

This program is more than just an egregious waste of our hard earned tax dollars; it is a glaring example of our country's apathy, and much worse, our country's racism.

The subtle racism of this buy-back program stems from a lily-white ignorance and stubborn denial that says that gun violence is only in Mattapan, Bridgeport and the Bronx. Last week a nine year-old in rural Montville, Conn. blew off his younger brother's face with his grandfather's gun. Do I need to mention Littleton or Paducah? Gun violence is everywhere.

Clinton's latest public relations stunt seeks to pacify the average white American citizen by making a scapegoat out of our nation's poorest housing projects. We don't want to believe it could happen to us so we blame someone else, someone without any political influence. By targeting inner cities with this program Clinton makes a fool out of the American people and helps them believe that gun violence still exists only in urban areas.

I'm sure Clinton's Rose Garden announcement brought a collective sigh of relief from white soccer moms and suburban dads across the country. "Thank God, Clinton is doing something about those dirty urban cesspools" they'll say over their three martini lunches. Their closed minds do not seek to challenge a racially biased justice system, nor do they seek to find a solution to the conditions in our nation's poorest urban areas.

Our apathy breeds inaction. We label these problems as someone else's to deal with. We feel more outrage over a blown call in a Red Sox game than we do for an entire generation of lost inner city youth.

For every death suffered from the barrel of a gun, we are to blame. We don't challenge our leaders to make effective policy. We accept publicity stunts as policy and think they will make a difference. We are pulling the trigger on our society.

Conservative or liberal, Democrat or Republican, it doesn't really make a difference. We have to take responsibility for the poor decisions made by our legislators. We have to take back the reigns of power from special interest groups and the NRA. We have to fight for legislation that truly aims at getting guns off the street, instead of feeding Big Macs to our nation's inner cities.

We don't need leaders cowering behind the thin veil of the Second Amendment. Mike Royko, a Chicago columnist, once said that our national anthem should be changed to, "Oh, say can you see by the pawn shop's dim light... Oh, don't you ever take my guns away from me because the right to shoot you is what I mean by liberty." Maybe someday the right to bear arms will get every family the true American dream-their own nuclear weapons.

Margot Stseca

Until we begin to see gun violence as an American issue and not a white or black issue, the blood of our nation's future will stain the streets of both suburban and urban areas. We need collective action to stop the sale of handguns.

There is no room for compromise and the buy-back program won't work. It will fail because it does not address the fundamental problems affecting America today. It especially fails to address the concerns plaguing our nation's inner cities. The people that Clinton is targeting do not need fast food. They don't need to be turned into some kind of social guinea pigs by the flick of his federal wand.

They do need adequate health care, immunizations, work programs, and education because right now they live in a domestic third world.

I bet $15 million would buy a truckload of textbooks, hire thousands of qualified teachers, and send an army of underprivileged kids to college.

Even a cardboard cutout could figure that out.

We all walk the long road

Last Saturday was one of the top-10 worst nights of my young life. I got dressed up and went to a Halloween party. I should have known that getting dressed up was going to cause trouble. The last time I dressed up, I went to a super hero party as Mighty Mouse. I went to the K-Mart at the mall and made my costume myself. My costume was awesome. Unfortunately, Mighty Mouse couldn't handle his liquor and the night kind of fell apart after that.

But this year I vowed to perfect the dressing up process. I used a stupid old mask and cape that I wore years ago and headed off to a party. I definitely didn't have the best costume there because two girls showed up wearing just their bras, shorts, high heels and angel wings. (I didn't know that strippers had angel wings; I guess they are resorting to gimmicks to get a competitive advantage.)

After some embarrassing and unwanted encounters with an ex-girlfriend, I was ready to leave the party. My friends bailed and left without me because I was busy working out personal problems that are months old. When I was done I ran to catch the last bus. I ran as fast as my intoxicated legs would carry me to the bus stop where I saw the red lights of the bus and a line of passengers boarding it through the front doors. Since the back doors were closed I sprinted for the front doors and I watched as they closed in my face. I pounded on the doors, and I watched as my friends pulled away.

Undeterred by this tragedy, I ran after the bus. When it stopped at the corner I pounded on the doors again but to no avail, and I watched as the bus pulled off down the road.

Now I was screwed. I was trapped, miles from home without a ride. I did what any other reasonable human being would do: I walked. I walked in the direction that the bus had gone off. The road was dark, but fortunately the night was warm, and I set off towards home. Figuring I was about two miles from home I decided that the walk would do me some good. I needed to clear my head anyway.

With my mask in one hand and my cape in the other I walked down the shoulder of the road. Which road I didn't know, but I expected to see familiar parts of Amherst any time. I passed the Amherst solid waste disposal center and I could smell myself get closer to home. Then I came up with the bright idea to run. I would run for a while, then walk to rest, and then run some more.

Time seemed to be going by very slowly, and I was beginning to get suspicious. I didn't know where I was. It was dark. I was alone. It was like I was in a bad scene from the Blair Witch Project. Then I passed Pelham Auto Parts store. I was confused as to why Amherst had a Pelham Auto Parts store, but I wrote it off as franchising and continued on my way. After all, I had to get home.

As I walked up a crest in the road I looked at my watch. I had been walking/running for an hour and a half. Then I saw a sight that broke my heart. Up ahead was the New Townhouse restaurant. I pass this restaurant every time I come to school because it is on Route 9. The good news was that I now knew where I was. The bad news was that I was in Belchertown. I had walked the in the wrong direction for and hour and a half, covering 3 miles in the early hours of Saturday morning.

This was when the frustration really set in. I sat down under a tree and I debated going to sleep. I was tired, hungry and frustrated. The ground under the tree was comfortable, but fortunately I regained my wits. I thought the better of sleeping. First of all, I had to get home. If I didn't return tonight, I would have to walk back to Amherst sober at 5 a.m. Second of all, I wouldn't want to be a member of the family on whose property that tree was located. Can you imagine waking up and finding a sleeping college kid on your lawn with a skeleton mask and a ratty black cape?

Matt Frascella

I got up and started walking again. At this point it was Halloween and the road was pitch black. It is funny at times like these when you remember all the scary stories and movies you have ever seen. Just thinking of how bad I Still Know What You Did Last Summer was scared me half to death. I couldn't see the moon because the clouds were so thick. I wished I was home playing Nintendo. The air was still and quiet, like the calm before the storm.

That was when I saw it. I actually felt it before I saw it. Suddenly I was cold and uneasy. It came up out of the woods with frightening quickness. Just looking at it chilled me to the very soul. It was too fast to be human. I remember thinking as I ran turned and ran as fast as I could, but it was faster. It came up on me and tackled me to the ground. I tried to scream but nothing came out. It slashed me across the chest with a sharp object and my blood spilled out onto the pavement. Instantly I felt warm in my chest. My life flashed before my eyes. I felt my heart beat twice before I found the courage to fight back. Beside me was a broken green beer bottle of Rolling Rock. With my strength quickly escaping me I lashed out at it and buried the bottle into its chest (thank God for #33), and staggered to my feet. Unable to walk, I stumbled two steps before rolling down an embankment into a cold wet brook. I heard a loud snap and again I felt pain. Fortunately, I only broke my arm and I was able to drag myself back home, bloody and exhausted.

All of this really happened except for that last paragraph. I made it up because it makes a better Halloween story. The scariest thing that really happened to me was seeing those girls in their underwear. Don't worry, not many people can pull that off. It is stupid to wander off by yourself from a party especially when you have been drinking. That was one of the dumbest things I have ever done. I could have gotten hurt, lost or worse. I learned my lesson in the form of a three hour, six mile walk along Route 9. Next time I'll leave early enough to catch the bus.

Don't judge the FAC by its lobby

I'm sick of hearing people complain about the new Fine Arts Center Lobby. Furthermore, I'm equally sick of hearing about how ugly the building is in general. I think that the campus community could find nastier things about this campus to harp on. They have my permission to start with the puddle of sour chocolate milk next to the Franklin D.C. (You know what I'm talking about – that big browny-orange puddle of ex-dairy product that curdles in the hollows of the pavement next to the service entrance.)

As a former music major and a current music minor, I can tell you from much experience that the outward appearance of the FAC is far from the most disturbing thing about the building.

For instance, in the year and a half I have spent in the FAC, I have heard alarming rumors that dead pigeons clog its ventilation systems. The idea of dead anything in my air supply is bothersome enough, but I have since discovered that pigeons are extremely toxic to humans, particularly the human respiratory system. Many rooms in the building do not have access to fresh oxygen because they don't have doors and windows that lead directly outside, and since many of the people in the FAC are attempting to use their lungs to play instruments or sing or speak, this rumor is fairly alarming. Try that on for size, and suddenly a flashing orange light doesn't look so bad.

Just to put this further into perspective, most of the actual inhabitants of the FAC that I know have little to say about how the building looks from the outside because they rarely see it from outside. The people I'm referring to are music majors. They are the pasty-faced people you might see wolfing down lunch, gig-bags at their side, in Franklin DC from time to time. A number of them are also in the UMass Marching Band that fills up the football field when the team leaves it on Saturday afternoons. For many music students, a typical day begins when the FAC opens its ugly doors at 7 a.m., and ends when they are forced outside again by custodians at 1 a.m. They spend most of this 18-hour period either inside or fighting to get inside the 20 or so pigeon-aired practice rooms approximately the size of your closet. The rest of a music major's day is spent in classes and ensemble rehearsals, all of which take place in slightly larger, but similarly airless and windowless rooms. Much of their sustenance comes from the vending machine in the practice-room hallway (and you have never seen a vending machine empty out faster than the one in the FAC).

The FAC is like an iceberg. The part you see and might object to the appearance of is only the very top part of the structure. The building extends down further than many buildings on this campus extend up – nearly four stories to the rehearsal rooms, 36 and 44, at the very bottom level. Many of us on this campus, myself included, have taken life with windows and sunlight for granted. That all changes when you live in the FAC; down there, I've had people ask me, peeking out of a practice room with eyes squinting like a mole's, what the weather was like outside. Sometimes they prefaced this question by asking, in all seriousness, what day of the week it was.

These are the extremes, of course. Not all music majors bury themselves so deeply in the FAC. But all of them work unbelievably hard at what is one of the most demanding and overloaded majors at this university. To major in music at an academic institution (as opposed to a conservatory) means that a student must first meet all the academic standards of the University while meeting the demands and rigors of the department. To accomplish this, all Music majors are automatically waived the 18-credit limit that other majors are held to here. The typical music education major considers it normal to be dealing with 22 credits.

Elizabeth Parisean

You might be wondering how someone who spends 12 to 18 hours in the FAC manages to pass GenEds. That's a good question, and I don't really know the answer. But I know that music majors do it.

Of course, it is the choice of these students to study music at UMass. You might be thinking: if they're stuck underground, they put themselves there, so tough noogies. This is true. But all their hard work goes towards making something that every student at this University can use and appreciate – music. Time and time again, truly brilliant performances by individual students and ensembles (which is to make no mention of those put on by the phenomenal Music Department faculty) are attended by a straggly following, usually other majors and faculty members. Not only does this mean that the performers go unsupported by the larger community, but the benefits their artistic efforts hold for the campus at large are also lost.

Next time you pass that ugly chunk of cement that ironically houses our fine arts, instead of complaining about the graceless architecture and the famous heating lobby light, look beyond them. Go to a concert or recital and see what the inside of the FAC is really all about. There are some incredibly talented people down there who deserve your applause.

SGA needs to shape up

It isn't so bad that the Student Government Association is, for all intents and purposes, a little student council from junior high school. It's not their petty whining, their small time projects or the popularity contests that elect senators. It's that they act the way they do with any backing.

The basis of the organization itself is too weak to be doing any whining. Both the President and the Trustee have to be elected by five percent of the student population, and most of the time, they are elected by just barely more. A few years ago, for a particular election, even five percent of students didn't turn out for the vote. Five percent. For example's sake, let's be generous and assume that there are 20,000 eligible voters on this campus.

Somehow, the election of these powerful individuals turned out to be so unimportant to so many people that less than 1,000 students showed up to vote. Assume a student population somewhat lower than that and it is clear that voting totals were pathetic. Assuredly, Hell, even if there were 20,000 eligible voters on campus, the voting totals were absolutely abysmal.

But let's assume, generously, that the SGA did get nine percent of the student vote, thus meaning that a grand total of 1,800 students on campus voted for the little president and trustee of this little club. Meanwhile, Senators are elected from their buildings after little to no campaigning, meaning that it is either whoever decides to run or the most popular person in the building that wins.

Now, maybe it is a statement about the students of this campus that so few of them came out to vote on the SGA hierarchy or the Senators. Maybe students are all just lazy and ignorant of the power that comes along with voting. Maybe the students are just dumb.

But students aren't dumb. They just don't vote for an organization that makes a mockery of itself on a fairly regular basis.

Sam Wilkinson

At the last SGA meeting, the gathered group came together and, in harmony, voted for one of the most momentous changes in policy ever. They voted to place an Automatic Teller Machine in Southwest for students.

Stop the presses. Update the web sites. The SGA has acted.

And for the good of all students, except those students not living in Southwest, the SGA acted. Other students don't need an ATM. They are not worthy of the SGA's attention. Which might be why the SGA is such a complete sham.

The student body of UMass has a group of people supposedly elected to represent them doing good for only one area of housing, albeit the biggest one. But one would think that there would be complaining at the lack of attention for other areas of housing.

But no. Not one letter in The Daily Collegian. Not one person on the radio. Nobody anywhere seemed to complain of the favoritism. There is rarely a complaint heard about the SGA anywhere, and especially internally, as if the SGA is never unsatisfied with itself.

So at least the group has that going for it, huh? At least they realize that if they don't all stand together, they will all hang apart. Or at least that seems to be the reality felt by at least some of the SGA members. In fact, at least once this year, someone quoted in the pages of the Collegian spoke her support for a motion that the SGA had voted down. In response, a Senator read a statement at an open meeting voicing her frustration with this free speaking individual, wondering why she would dare stand publicly against the SGA majority.

God forbid there exist even the smallest amount of dissension in the ranks of the SGA. God forbid there be even one person who would dare question the greatness of the SGA. God forbid that anyone, anywhere, would not look to the SGA as the single most infallible organization ever.

Right.

Isn't a good give and take what having this government is all about? Isn't the point of student government that students on all sides of the issue are represented? The SGA, on a good year, represents nine percent of the student body, again generously. That's no majority. That is a just few friends of each senator voting in a small little election.

If the SGA really wants to walk around and have the clout it claims to, the SGA had better do more to bring out the voters, and that includes not wasting good time on small projects like getting one ATM when five are needed. It most certainly includes allowing for widespread dissension within the SGA's ranks, as such dissent would lead to split opinions. Split opinions leads to split sides. Split sides leads to split people. Split people lead to votes.

And votes are the key to what the SGA needs if it is ever to be taken seriously. If the SGA could bring out twenty percent, people might start to take notice. And when people start to take notice, the SGA stops looking like a junior high student council and starts looking like a political organization.

Call me Ishmael....

One of the first calls for my roommate this semester was from someone who was calling for "Sal."

This confused me, as my roommate's name is Scott. Luckily, the person on the phone realized the problem and corrected her mistake, asking for my roommate by his given name.

The purpose of this little introduction brings me to the topic of my column: nicknames. You see, dear readers, I am the self proclaimed king of nicknames.

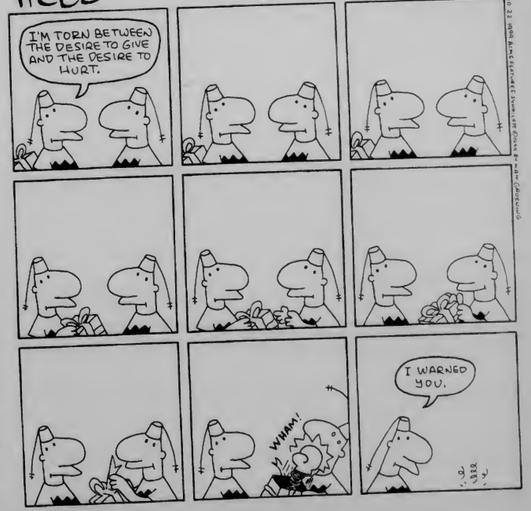
The following is as complete a list of names that people have used to refer to me since I was born: Chippy-Nose, Monkey, Crow-D, Bub, Chrissy, Bubka, Bread, Bread-maker, Bread-man, Bubster, Bubber, Bubka-bread, Chrissy-Bubby, Chuck, The Wall, Chuckles, Chuck-Wagon-Gravy-Train-Filled-With-Beefy-Juices-YAH, Little pup, Collegian Chris, Work Horse, and Darth Maul. There are others, but I think this list is more than enough. Now, I might as well begin with Chippy-Nose, which was my very first nickname. My brother John made it up for me when he was in his less- than-nice-to-his-little-brother stage, which lasted until I was a couple of inches taller than he was. He would run around the house yelling, "Mister Ya Ya Chippy-Nose!!!" Of course I was young at that point, and I really didn't understand the deep-seated psychological issues that I was slowly developing by being called "Mister Ya Ya Chippy-Nose!!!"

Chris Collins

Anyway, to skip ahead a few years, I was called "Chuck-Wagon-Gravy-Train-Filled-with-Beefy-Juices-YAH," at our more or less daily street hockey games. They would always refer to me by that nickname. I suppose they probably would have asked each other, "Is Chuck-Wagon-Gravy-Train-Filled-with-Beefy-Juices-YAH coming to play today?" To which the other would respond, "Yeah. I called Chuck-Wagon-Gravy-Train-Filled-with-Beefy-Juices-YAH and he said he was coming." This nickname, I think, probably did the most damage out of all the nicknames that I would have to deal with over the years. But most of the names I took in stride because after all, what's in a name, right?

The next important nickname was "Bread," which again came from my brother who apparently thought that it was funny to refer to me as one of the major food groups. This was also the first of many nicknames that he began expanding on. Like a Hollywood producer, he found one idea and beat it into the ground, so "Bread" became "Bread maker" and then "Bread-winner" and "Bread-man."

Using the B sound from Bread I eventually became Bub, and then my brother's girlfriend Melissa decided that I needed to become Chrissy Bubby, or Bubby or Chrissy, which were all line except of course for Chrissy, which I thought made me sound a little too much like a five year old girl.



Of course when I came to UMass, I thought I would escape my old nicknames, and I have for the most part (although I have sort of embraced Bub or Bubka because they were used so much that I had no chance of ever leaving them behind). Of course, I've managed to acquire more nicknames since I've come here, a fact that leaves me scratching my head as to why people who seem to be rushing through all aspects of their lives end up having time to make up nicknames for me.

The three newest names I've been given are: Collegian Chris (because of my lovely column that is occasionally read by upwards of six people every week), Lil Pup (I'm not sure why I was named this, but one of the freshman on my floor called me it, and the rest of the first year students have picked it up, so I guess I'm stuck with it), and finally Darth Maul (which is what my RA Megan – she said I had to mention that she was the best RA in the world or she would manage to have some fun with my permanent record at the University – decided to call me because she thinks that I wear too much black).

Of course, I would complain about my nicknames if it wasn't for the fact that as I was writing this column, I compared my list of names to those of other people I know, and I decided that I wasn't in that bad of a boat. One of my friends is known as "Noodles" because when he runs he looks like a wet noodle, and another of my friends when she heard I was writing about nicknames told me her father used to refer to her as "S@#'head" which I find endearing. But still, I would rather not be called that.

Well, anyway, I think I've revealed more than enough about myself for one column, and if anyone has any questions they can feel free to call me. I'm in the book under Chuck Wagon.

Danzig's latest fails to impress

Glen Danzig (Center) and his band's newest CD leaves much to be desired.

DANZIG
6:66 Satan's Child
Evilive

The name of the album is 6:66 Satan's Child, for god's sake. Do I even need to review it? Needless to say, the latest offering from Danzig doesn't offer many surprises. Disturbing demonic cover art? Check. Naked chicks, both drawn and real, in the booklet? Of course. Tongue in cheek (?) lyrics involving pain, fear, and demons? Needn't even ask. But Danzig really has done more than enough for the metal and punk scenes over the years that he really doesn't need to break any new ground. The latest offering will be more than enough to satisfy Danzig fans, and has some great riffs that make it an enjoyable listen for any metal fan, but not nearly enough to warrant a purchase for the casual fan.

Here is a short history of the legend that is Glenn Danzig. He fronted the seminal punk band the Misfits from 1977-1983, after which time he formed the doom-metal group Samhain, and later Danzig consisting of some ex-Samhain members. Danzig the band has released five previous albums as well as an EP. Thrallddemonsweetlive, which owes much of its success to the massive hit that was the live version of "Mother." The best of the band's previous outings is widely considered Danzig III: How the God's Kill, which was released in 1992. The current line-up consists of Danzig on vocals and additional guitars, Josh Lazie on bass, and drummer Alex Castillo.

Danzig has enlisted some unusual talent to help him with his newest release. Jas Gordon and Anita Death of Orgy mix seven of twelve tracks on 6:66 Satan's Child, and although their influence isn't really noticeable, they do have a hand in some of the best tracks on the album. The opening track "Five Finger Crawl" is a good, if basic, rocking opener with a stop and go guitar riff on the chorus that is worthy of the devil horns to be lifted high into the sky. The union also works on "Unspeakable," a classic anti-authority anthem with some memorable drum work from Joey C., and "apokalips," which utilizes the slow to heavy build-release formula that Korn perfected over five years ago.

Unfortunately, all the mixing in the world won't make a bad track good, and there really isn't much that can be done with the pulse-stopping-ly-slow piece of "Lilin" or the horrible "East Indian Devil (kali's song)." The latter track features a droning, grating guitar thankfully masking Danzig's vocals, which on this song have been altered for some reason to sound like he is ten feet underwater.

Some enjoyable slow songs include "Cold Eternal," another personal track, this one with a slow, ambient sound, and album closer "Thirteen." And the heavy title track, although not one of the album's finest moments, sees the band having the most fun, with Danzig screaming like he means it and both Lazie and Joey C. at top form.

6:66 Satan's Child has its moments, but not nearly enough of them to raise this album above the status of a mediocre release. A better showcase of Danzig's talents can be found by digging deeper back into Danzig's catalogue. C

Oct. 29

There is a wiry petite distinction between an entertainer and an elemental deejay. While some vinyl jockies of the hip-hop genre elicit their entertainment by spinning a strict selection of easily accessible music, others entertain audiences with flamboyance and charisma, creating an implicit relationship between the rotating turntables and the circuitously booty-bending bystanders. Overtly, selecting an appropriate repertoire is only the middlemost aspect of a deejay's set. The true challenge in turntable entertainment lies in smoothly concocting and agilely manipulating the inter-persement of songs. Exercising the fundamentals of stage soliloquy or stand-up comedy, a truly polished turntablist can instinctually capture and anticipate the crowd's reactions. Thus, the invisible noise-o-meter (theoretically implemented to gage audience responsiveness) at a deejay driven show should ideally configure a shape resembling say, Bart Simpson's hair or Charlie Brown's tee-shirt: momentuous peaks of continuously natural enthusiasm.

With that said it is important to understand that Funk Master Flex is the consummate entertainer. Perhaps the most affluent record spinner in hip-hop, Flex has revolutionized the basses of deejaying. He is a true salesman of rap music, an industrial individual who possesses the power to bring success to virtually anyone he chooses (witness Pharaoh Monch's "Simon Says"). His three nationally consumed mix-CD's pioneered a commercial mixing movement which inspired similar offerings from Clue, Tony Touch and J-Ro.ce and Babu (Soundbombing.) In addition to building his own entertainment management company, Funk Flex is the resounding voice of Hot 97, hip-hop's most influential radio station, as well as various New York City businesses such as Modell's Sporting Goods. Yet aside from his outer accomplishments, his abilities in the province of turntablism are fairly ordinary. And although his skills are fundamentally competent, it is his musical selection and unmistakably baritone, projecting intonations that has given him an infamously catchy deejay signature. For clubs, mix-tapes and radio frequencies his marginal attributions have served him wonderfully, but as an elemental exhibitionist, he is sorely a disappointment. Quite simply, Funk Master Flex performed with the impotent limpness of a man thrice his age.

The flip side of his augmented notoriety is that now he is touted as a headliner, a main stage attraction, one who commands enormous bargaining power in salary and venue. Consequently, it was apparent that his sojourn to UMass was a calculated business procedure. He brought his equipment, vinyl collection, bodyguards and fame, but appeared to improvise the rest. For all intents and purposes, he gave the impression that no aspect of his set was planned, researched or pre-rehearsed. It was as if we were witnessing a dry-run practice session of him honing his skills in a secluded basement. His surveillance and interpretive processing of the crowd's energy was visionless. His blends (the on-beat transition from one record to another) were non-existent. His double-beguilements of the same record were overwhelmingly clemency. Even his dance-inciting vocal animations via a live mic were timid and carelessly timed. Often times he would lackadaisically drop a familiar instrumental with his own dubbed-over "yeah, yeah...now throw your hands up" sentiments while he would dance behind his turntables and aimlessly dig through his crates for a subsequent record. Effectually, that imaginary noise-o-meter read like a headline curly locks: a sweeping circumlocution of subtle, active enthusiasm and equitable confusion.

Punctuating the evening, Flex took the stage precisely 15 seconds before the clock struck 12:01, as if avoiding overstaying his welcome. Unfortunately, the Funk Master's dismissal, unengaged, business-like performance does not reflect properly on UPC's admirable attempt to bring well-know disk jock to our campus. Hopefully we can look forward to additional events of this content rather than this caliber.

Post-Halloween dementia

This past Sunday (or for some strange reason, Saturday in some areas) hundreds of thousands of America's youth filled the streets. No it was not Britney Spears' new album or Hanson's dance party; it was Halloween. When children dress up as their favorite ghouls (the starting line-up of the 1999 New York Yankees) and goblins (George Steinbrenner) and other assorted costumes ranging from the unique rabbit-in-the-hat to the infamous hobo. The always-present wings of the angels and pointy tails of the devils wondering the streets of suburbia of course join them.

Every year I see at least a dozen devils begging for candy, saying in unison, "Trick or Treat." Wait a minute? What am I saying? Nobody says, "trick or treat." The little kids don't even bother saying those three words and syllables anymore. They just hold out their bags and smile at Granny as she dishes out candy relishing in the only company she's seen since Easter. Nope, they're too busy trying to fill their plastic bags full of candy to even make conversation. They are anticipating the one night a year when their parents forget that little Timmy didn't eat his meatloaf and let him eat enough candy for his local dentist to go into cardiac arrest. And those of us who give out candy don't really care if they say those words or not. We are hostages in our own homes until we give out packets that contain five to seven M&Ms. We just want them off our property and pawn them off to the next household.

While these people wait for trick-or-treaters, or the lack there of in some cases, they normally put on a scary movie or whatever edited movie or television special a network throws on the air. There are always the same shows that are showed on All Hallows Eve. The Garfield episode where he and Odie are stuck on Pirate Island and an old man tell them a spooky story. The Charlie Brown classic episode with the infamous story of the "Great Pumpkin." Linus's creation that merges Santa Clause and a pumpkin patch who gives out presents to all those kids in the pumpkin patch. And if you have cable, The Cartoon Network offers a marathon of Scooby-Doo episodes. Although these are overplayed and everyone has seen them at least three times, these specials offer a fine distraction from the boredom of waiting.

Another favorite thing for those who don't want to leave their house on the night of the dead, for fear that it will be egged or worse, is to rent movies. Of course this year was no exception, especially with the release of the groundbreaking film The Blair Witch Project. Now I don't know just how scary this movie is. I haven't seen it, but I know many people who have. Some have said that is so scary people were crying during and after the movie. Others have referred to it as being dumb, that it wasn't that scary because there was no blood. I tend to think that I would agree with those who thought it was frightening, the movie works like that of a nightmare. It's everyone's fear that they will be lost in the woods and when the fear is psychological in nature violence is not always necessary. I've never understood why people like to be scared beyond belief, but that is obviously what makes this movie so popular. A source at my local video store says they have received 120 copies of The Blair Witch Project, as well as 100 copies of the 30-minute "documentary." As of 10 o'clock Sunday night, all of those copies had been rented for the last three days and the extra footage version of the video had rented unbelievably well. And if those people who wanted to analyze every single word and scene wished to, they could buy the film. One can assume that this will be a Halloween movie people will be watching for the next 20 years.

That's right, you can add The... Project to Halloween flicks like: Halloween, the movie that made Jaime Lee Curtis the actress that she is today. Directed by John Carpenter, the film was set in Illinois; set all the cars had California license plates. From that blockbuster spawned a series of sequels originally called Halloween II-VI as well as the recently released Halloween H20. Basically, all the films deal with a serial killer who stalks a particular family line, except for III, which for some reason broke up the story line of Michael Myers, the ceramic masked killer who stalks Jaime Lee Curtis in two of the seven films (not the Austin Powers creator).

Nicholas Pizzolato

It seems that all scary movies have an atrocious amount of sequels. For instance Nightmare on Elm Street and Friday the 13th are two movies that people watch for a scare-a-thon. Maybe the first one of each of the movies was kind of scary, but they just got ridiculous after that. I honestly don't even know how many roman numerals come after either of these movies. Both of the movies had at least one title that proclaimed the lead thrasher to be dead, but two years later, the killer comes back. And they come back with the same truffer, a hand clutching his favorite tool of death emerging from the ground.

Halloween is a time when townies look forward to scaring little kids with costumes that show them decapitated. The fear in the toddler dressed up as Spider-Man gives these people a cheap thrill, and the anger in their eyes is equally amusing when the toddler's older brother and his friends egg the guys house and TP his trees. The night is fun for all and it only comes around once a year. So get ready, there are only 362 days left to get your next costume set. And for you Hollywood execs, that means there are only 220 days left to shoot, edit, and have Will Smith write the soundtrack for Friday the 13th on Elm Street: Jason and Freddy's Return from Hell After Death to Kill Some More People.

Windmill Sax Quartet impresses

The Windmill Saxophone Quartet is a confident, attentive unit displaying collective vision greater than that of a displaced big band front line. As many of the pieces do explore some sort of big band horn-orchestration tradition, the bulk of their ideas come directly from the group's own take on the fluidity and spontaneity available to an instrumentation of this sort. The ensemble's arrangements are exciting and rely on an advanced degree of familiarity among its members. Dense sections are held together by the space each horn is able to leave, allowing an attentive restraint to prevail throughout the session as they rely on one another to fill any sound gaps written into the pieces.

The saxophonists are listening closely to one another, and as they flow freely into section-of-solos, the improvisation the music maintains a consonant and rhythmically uncluttered quality. Parts shift adding a great deal of depth to the compositions as melodies are passed among the horns and themes are layered on top of each other. Ken Plant's take on "Invitation" utilizes this technique often, most noticeably in the head and initial solo sections.

The arrangements succeed in balancing the instruments, often juxtaposing clarinet or flute with baritone sax or bass clarinet in such a way that the instruments are given equal weight in the pieces, as illustrated in Jesse Meman – "With The bass saxophone's thick flute for the tune's melody before finding its layer at the bottom of the ensemble, initializing a very cool piece that utilizes a number of stop-breaks and direction changes. The arrangement takes on an even deeper level of personalization as there are a number of instrument changes over the course of the piece. Meman's writing takes full advantage not only of the different horns available, but also the skills each member brings to the quartet. Meman achieves a similar balance in his "Perennial Abuse," a delicate orchestration incorporating elements of a string quartet or chamber ensemble music.

Further highlights include Jesse Meman's treatment of the Beatles' "I Am the Walrus," his "Off-White Rhapsody," and Tom Monroe's interesting broken-time rendering of the Coltrane piece "Naima."

A step up, but men's XC falls short at Atlantic 10s

By Farrah Alexander
Collegian Staff

"There is no better feeling than beating a rival at [their] home", Massachusetts men's cross country coach Ken O'Brien said last week, referring to their impending meet at the Atlantic 10 Championship which took place this past Saturday.

Given that the Minutemen finished in fourth place out of 11 teams at the A-10 Championships that took place at Belmont Plateau in Philadelphia, O'Brien might be feeling a tad celebratory this week.

LaSalle seized the victory with 35 points, followed by Virginia Tech which finished in second place with 70 points. St. Joseph's took the third place seat with 94 points, and UMass followed in fourth with 157 points. Rhode Island came in a close fifth, finishing with 156 points.

A quartet of sensational sophomores once again led the way for the Minutemen. Kevin Curtin was the first to cross the finish line for UM, placing 17th overall with a time of 26:05.7. This was the first time that Curtin led the was for the Minutemen this season. His best finish prior was at Vermont this past September, when he placed 12th overall and was the second runner to cross the finish line for UMass.

One of the team's most consistent racers this season, Ryan Corbett, finished second on the squad and 19th overall with a time of 26:09.5. Corbett has been the top finisher for the Minutemen this season, with a string of back-to-back first place finishes for the Maroon and White.

UMass sophomores Colin Baughman and David Prasse rounded out the top four by securing the 34th and 35th places overall, with times of 26:39.5 and 26:41.7, respectively. UMass senior Matt Ely finished with a time of 26:48.1, taking the 38th overall spot in the race. Not only was this race a challenge because St. Joseph's and LaSalle had the home course advantage, but the course itself presented an especially treacherous obstacle for the Minutemen. "The course at the A-10's is a little bit more demanding," sophomore Ryan Corbett said. "There's one hill that goes almost straight up for a good bit. And there are a couple of hills that keep winding up, so it's a different course, a more strength demanding course." Despite the loss of at least three top runners this season, the Minutemen demonstrated their penchant for speed by coming in 4th place, one spot ahead of their 5th place finish last season, just as the Atlantic 10 coaches' poll had predicted.

Although the majority of runners this season are sophomores, the top seven runners have stepped up their game a notch just as O'Brien had hoped. Their improvement has successfully compensated for the loss, and the team has avoided a large drop-off. The Maroon and White will next be in action on November 13, when its top seven runners compete in the NCAA Northeast Regional in Boston. From there the team will move on to the NCAA Championship in Bloomington, IN on November 22nd.

Tonight marks the first game in maroon and white for Crooks, the former St. John's player who sat out last year due to NCAA transfer rules. Much is expected of DePina who played minimally last year for UMass while averaging just under two points per game.

Kirkland, one of the most improved players in the conference last year, has been the leader on the court so far in practice. In the final seven games last year the 6-6 forward averaged 18.1 ppg to match 9.7 rpg. Senior big man Anthony Oates, a transfer from Yavapai College in Prescott, Ariz., should see a lot of time on the court this year when he joins Kirkland upfront. Junior forward Winston Smith, who suffered a torn ACL in his sophomore campaign, will make his way back into the lineup after playing in 22 games last year.

"I think the guys are ready to stop playing each other and are ready for a game," said Kirkland. "And once we get Monty back we'll be even better."

One of the new goals for the squad is to improve team relations after last year's dismal and difficult season. "Guys get on each other but we tell them don't take it personally, and we're getting along a lot easier and having more fun," said Kirkland.

The Minutemen hope that their newly found transition game will lead to easier points.

"It's good," Kirkland said about the more fast-paced scheme on offense. "I'm running in front of the ball and getting easier points. We're doing a lot of different things."

Flint, who intends to press as much as his team can tonight, believes it forwards have the athletic ability to run the floor better.

"We're going to get a little tired out there with not enough guys," said Flint. "But when the lights come on, we're going to see whose not playing well in practice but plays well in the games and whose playing well in practice but who doesn't play well in the games."

The California All Stars are a young group coached by Phil Bryant. Standouts include recent Michigan grad Robbie Reid, Fresno St.'s Willie Earles, and former Arizona guard Dylan Rigdon.

game from the defensive end first and focus on rebounding, so when you lose three big rebounders like we did, you have some holes to fill."

To offset the team's losses and accommodate the influx of young legs, O'Brien has steered her troops toward a more up-tempo game plan for this season. While this style can sometimes be a nightmare for developing players, O'Brien insists that the team as a whole has welcomed the concept with open arms.

"As a group they've stated, and I'm going to hold them to their words, that they want to be able to run in transition," O'Brien said. "They also know that the only way you run in transition is to play good defense, force bad shots if you can, and rebound the heck out of the basketball. That's something that we're going to do; we're going to hold them to their word. If it's what they want to do, I think we can get it done."

Running their opposition off the floor offensively is only half of the game plan, according to the coach. O'Brien intends to use her rekindled roster to apply nasty full-court pressure on the other side of the ball; that system should really reap the rewards of a youthful roster.

"We're also going to be able to go back to a little more of a pressing team, which is what I really like to do," O'Brien said. "I know last year we did that a little bit, but we couldn't do it as much because of sheer numbers. It's a long season, and when you've got kids playing 38 minutes a game having to play baseline to baseline it gets hard. I look at this group, we've got 12 people that all can play, and all can contribute in different ways. We should be able to get ourselves back to the point of being able to play 94 feet."

Using all of her players to swarm the entire court, O'Brien seems intent on getting the biggest bang possible out of her team this year. And with a volatile mix of vigor and wisdom, the '98 Minutewomen do indeed seem ready to blow up the competition. "Our expectations are pretty high for ourselves," O'Brien said.

"We're young for the most part, but we're old at some other spots. I think the combination of the youthful enthusiasm and the old experience, if they come together, can make some big things happen."

22nd in the overall race with a time of 19:23.

Coach LaFreniere felt heading down to the A10 Championships that it was a "toss-up between UMass, LaSalle and Virginia Tech."

There is a lot of experience and seniority on this team. Along with this seniority came the heart and dedication to win this meet. Some of these runners have experienced the A-10 win three times, others only once, but they all have a common bond. Everyone on the team has experienced nothing less than a win at this meet.

"Our athletes go down to win. They want to get up and run to the best of their ability," said LaFreniere.

The plan for this meet was to go out and be conservative for the first mile. LaFreniere did not want any of the women in the lead, but after the first mile they were free to run up. In the first mile there were no Minutewomen in the lead pack. According to the coach, "We were where we wanted to be at the first mile. The lead pack was running quickly. They must have been very excited and forgotten that the race was three miles. One mile is where the race begins."

A little was into the second mile there is Parachute Hill. Many of the runners in the lead pack (which contained three from LaSalle, among others) began to fall behind, and this is where UMass began to move up. According to Tillotson, "Everyone passed LaSalle on their home course."

Team training had prepared them for the course. Tillotson spoke about LaFreniere and said, "She did well on coaching us. She did things that she didn't do all season long. An example was running downhill. She taught us to run properly. It really helped." Coach Julie LaFreniere was named Atlantic 10 coach of the year for the sixth time in the '90s.

The team seems very excited about the NCAA regional championships on Nov. 13 at Franklin Park in Boston.

"Last year everyone deflated after the A-10 meet physically and mentally," Was said. "Now there is a different attitude. Everyone is motivated to pull out a good performance."

Horoscopes

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You're going to have to concentrate on your single primary objective today if success is to be yours. Don't allow yourself to be sidetracked.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You're likely to be recognized for an important contribution today. Take care that you don't become cocky or overzealous as a result.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – It may be difficult for you to make heads or tails of an unexpected development today. Trust the input of friends and loved ones.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Openness and freedom are what it's all about today, and you mustn't do anything which may cramp someone else's style.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You have more on your mind today than business affairs. Indeed, now is the time to focus more intently on pressing personal issues.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You may be more difficult to figure out today than ever before, partly because you're following your own instincts all the more faithfully.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You may have a short fuse today, and you should do what you can to avoid contact with anyone who is out to ruffle your feathers.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You mustn't make excuses for unacceptable behavior today, nor should you accept them from others. Don't close your eyes to dangerous patterns.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You're wheels may not be turning as freely as usual today. Concentrate on your own internal mechanism and be sure you're not low on fuel!

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – A conflict of interest is likely to arise today between yourself and an Aries native – one who thinks, by the way, that you're far off-course.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – It's a good time to change your ways at home and begin to take better care of yourself, both outside and in. Mind over body go hand in hand.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – Take care you don't begin outreaching yourself today. Focus on that which is attainable, and don't let greed get the better of you.

Gophers goof off in Big 10, prepare for Happy Valley

Oh Minnesota, how I feel for thee. A month ago, I called you a fluke. After all, two years ago, you stood at 3-8 worrying more about the departure of Bobby Jackson from the basketball squad than a hapless football program. One thing's for sure. It's still the coach-e- game.

Glen Mason arrived to Minneapolis in late 1996, after leading Kansas back to prominence. For nine seasons, Mason turned around the fortunes of the loop-minded Jayhawks. Before that the road took him through Kent. Now Mason's magic has come to Minnesota.

The '96 squad was the laughing-stock of the loaded Big 10 Conference.

yielding a conference-worst 246 yards on the ground to bruising rushing attacks across the board. On the flip-side, the Golden Gophers averaged a meager 104 yards running the ball.

From day one, Mason assured that his Gophers would play Big 10 football- more physical, more conservative and certainly more successful. After a 3-8 campaign in '97, UM went 5-6 last season, marking its best record since a 6-5 season in 1990.

After a 3-0 start, the Gophers hit the conference schedule and immediately fell flat on their faces. Drew Brees and the Purdue Boilermakers pulled Minnesota back to Earth, with Brees throwing for a career-best 522 yards and six touchdowns. After losses to Penn State and Michigan State, the Gophers finally got their break, a 19-18 homecoming victory when Adam Bailey connected on a 37-yard field goal with 13 seconds remaining to take the lead and the win away from the Spartans.

The big win has dodged the Gophers thus far this season, but respectability builds in the Midwest as Minnesota is no longer a second thought. So far this season, Mason has had to watch his team go through the pains of growing, losing games in final minutes when victory is calling its name.

First it was Wisconsin, who rode the back of Vitaly Pisetsky, whose two late, field goals led the Badgers to a 20-17 overtime victory. Ohio State overcame a 17-14 fourth-quarter deficit as Dan Stultz connected on a pair of field goals, including the game-winner from 40 yards out with 1:15 remaining. And then last week against Purdue, Brees burned the second-ranked pass defense for 293 yards and two touchdowns as Minnesota, finally getting balancing the scales with a running game.

It's like a broken record. You've heard the horseshoes and hand grenades cliché. The Gophers need just one win in their final three games to qualify for a Bowl. One would think that their competitiveness in the Big-Ten/Big 10 would easily lock up an appearance in a mid-range Bowl. But if Mason wants to take a leap instead of a hop, Minnesota needs to win in Happy Valley this weekend, a nearly impossible task considering Penn State is 4-0 in the all-time series and its defense is showing no signs of letting up.

This season, Joe Paterno is as stubborn as they come, insisting on going with Kevin Thompson when Rashard Casey has clearly been more explosive. Thompson threw three picks in Penn State's 27-7 loss, while Casey, just a junior, ran and threw for a touchdown.

Against Minnesota, Paterno and his Lions will need to mimic their adversaries, keeping the ball out of the air and out of the opponents' hands. The Lions won't face a better secondary this season. Thompson has shown he is one-dimensional, while Casey's mobility creates passing opportunities.

Minnesota will force turnovers and win the time of possession battle handily. If Thompson is out by the second quarter, chances are Minnesota has gotten to him, averaging the most sacks per game in the conference.

Joey... we know you're the greatest and all, but let's be realistic here. Bring in The Man. Bring Casey to the plate. Thompson almost doesn't count. Getting 14 on the road, I'll take Minnesota in a wild one at University Park. Last week: 1-4 Overall: 18-16-1

Those Buffs, oh, those Buffs. So inconsistent yet Ralphie and the CU band continue to run as though Eric Bienemy still dances around opposing defenses. This season, Colorado needs just a win to qualify for a Bowl and it has seemingly peaked at the right time, knocking off Oklahoma last weekend, 38-24. This week, they hit the road to take on undefeated Kansas State. Giving just 16, I'll go with the 'Cats in a romp over the overrated Buffs.

In other action, I'll take Purdue giving two against Wisconsin, Oklahoma State with a touchdown and change against Texas and Tennessee giving 9, at home against the Fighting Irish. Brett Mauser is a Collegian columnist

Always bet on Black: UMass cashes in

CA native comes east to Amherst, finds scoring column, record book

By Matt Crocker
Collegian Staff

Not even master lyricists or rhyme-dropping virtuosos Dr. Dre and Tupac could express the love the University of Massachusetts soccer fans have for their California native, whose deadly offensive game has made more opponents plead for mercy than your average hip-hop maestros.

Hailing from San Jose, Calif., senior forward Adam Black has been a dominant offensive force for the Minutemen this season. He has contributed to the already strong performances of senior goalie Todd Fowler, who is now ranked fourth on the all-time save list, and sophomore Fred Kinateder, who scored ten goals. Throw in senior Todd Baron, who dominated the midfield as well as scoring five goals, and Jonathan Bibb who recorded nine assists and UMass has a solid home structure heading into the postseason. The performance earned the Minutemen (13-6 overall, 8-3 A-10) a place in this weekend's Atlantic 10 Tournament and dispelled any demons remaining from last year's disappointing 4-12-2 finish.

"We are playing like more of a team this year, and we have some good new additions in the back", said Black when asked about this season's turnaround. "We found a chemistry, we found a way to score and those things put together lead to success."

It is an observation the '99 Minutemen know very well, as the team's ability to work well together yielded 46 goals during the regular season. Black drove home 16 of that total in 11 of the 19 games this season, making him the leading scorer and point man for UM and one of the top offensive threats in the A-10 Conference.

"It has been 100 percent the supporting cast. The players around me have picked it up and my job has been easy," remarked Black when asked to comment on his record-setting goal scoring performance this season. "The people behind me have been setting me up, and it has been easy pickings."

Whether it was being in the right place at the right time or having the innate ability to navigate the hall past the goaltender, the fact remains that Black did indeed deliver 16 balls to the back of the net, a feat that gave Black a reputation as a deadly ball handler, but also a position in the record books.

In the national spectrum, with an eight-game scoring streak, Black is tied for 12th in the NCAA for most consecutive games scored. However, on the home front, Black will find himself amidst many pages of Minutemen soccer lore.

Standing second in most goals scored in a single season at UMass, Black ended the season just shy of the number one position, needing just one more goal to join hands with Randy Jacobs, who netted 17 goals in 1992. Black is also ranked third in both single-season points in school history with 38 and games with six or more points with two, both coming this season.

Besides breaking school records, Black has also made his mark on his adversaries' logs. Acquiring eight points against St. Joseph's (three goals and two assists), Black became the first Minutemen since 1995 to get a hat trick and the first since 1993 to put together an eight-point performance. Just recently, Black delivered another spectacular point total, tallying six as he scored twice and assisted on two others against Fordham. Black received Atlantic 10 Co-Player of the Week honors for his play.

It wasn't all for the senior. Black also took home the WFMP/UMass Athlete of the Week award for scoring a pair of goals in UM's 3-2 defeat of 12th-ranked Washington. Finishing off four teams with the game-winning goal and finding the scoring column against conference rivals George Washington and Dayton, Black provided either breathing room or a decisive knockout punch to the competition.

Now with the season over and the fallen A-10 foes in the rear view, Black and the Minutemen prepare for the postseason this weekend in Dayton, Oh. with the A-10's. The second-seeded Minutemen will meet the Rhode Island Rams in the first round of the championship.

"If we come ready to play and we get back into our winning ways, Rhode Island is definitely beatable," said Black about the upcoming tournament. "I'm looking forward to it and I know the whole team is looking forward to it as well."

Adam Black has put the scoring back into the Minutemen's offense, leading the team in goals and into battle this weekend at the A-10 Tournament in Dayton.

Yet, whatever the results of this weekend's games Black will remain one player on a team of great players this season, and will remember his final days at the reins of the Minuteman offense.

"I'm going to miss my playing days here. I have had a good solid two and a half years here said Black when asked about his graduation from the team after this season. "It will be a little sad to leave, but everybody's time comes, so it is time to move on.

However, Black will not leave without getting his props, as the UMass soccer community will send the San Jose resident much California love for his large contributions to a budding men's soccer program.

Women's X-C blazes to fifth-straight A-10 crown

By Trisha Turcotte

Sunny skies led to sunny times for the Massachusetts women's cross country team, as it did some shining of its own en route to a fifth-straight conference crown.

On Saturday the Massachusetts women's cross country team headed to Philadelphia to race at Belmont Plateau for the Atlantic 10 Championships. The race began at 1:45. It was an unexpectedly warm day, with temperatures in the mid 70's that gave some of the runners a little difficulty.

"The women had their hard workouts at 6:30 Wednesday mornings," coach Julie LaFreniere said. "The temperature was low, sometimes around 51 degrees. The heat hit us hard." Given the circumstances, the Minutewomen still came in first place for the seventh time in nine years. The Maroon and White gave a spectacular performance, placing four runners in the top-10 and ending with an impressive score of 44 points.

Behind UMass were LaSalle (70 points), Virginia Tech (76 points), St. Joseph's (124 points), and Dayton (160 points).

Senior Nicole Way crossed the finish line first for the Minutewomen. She came in third place overall with an astounding performance of 18:40. With this accomplishment, she received All-Atlantic 10 honors for the second time in her career at UMass. "It is my third year and I am finally getting prepared mentally and physically," Way said. "Too bad it is my last year."

Sophomore Kristin Cisowski, who was last year's individual champion, finished right behind Way with a time of 18:42. Cisowski finished fourth overall. Way feels that, "Kristin pulled me through the race."

In third and fourth place, respectively, were senior Sharon Tillotson and junior Melissa Henderson. Tillotson came in with a seventh place finish overall and a time of 18:47. Henderson came in eighth, right behind Tillotson, with a time of 18:48.

"Sharon ran her best race in four years – by far," said Coach LaFreniere. "She chopped her time from 31 seconds down to 7 seconds."

Way felt that Tillotson's performance was great also. "This was her first All Conference title. She did a great job." LaFreniere. "Sharon often struggles with injuries. She was definitely a great motivational factor for the team!" Tillotson was also happy with her performance and her first All Atlantic 10 honors.

"I felt I really helped the team. It was neat to get a plaque with 3 of my teammates. We were so close to each other. It made it better to win," Tillotson said. "It was great to cross the finish line with only six seconds between you and your top teammate."

This shows teamwork and dedication, both of which this team has. "Cross country is a team sport," LaFreniere said. "There is no room for individuals. It is a team thing and they really pulled together."

Way also felt that the team pulled together. "There was a great team effort. We really came together as a team," Way said. "We had a meeting before the race and you could feel the enthusiasm."

The final scorer for UMass was senior Lizzie Sheptyck. She placed

Brand new Minutemen gear up for '99 campaign

By Kathleen Ralls

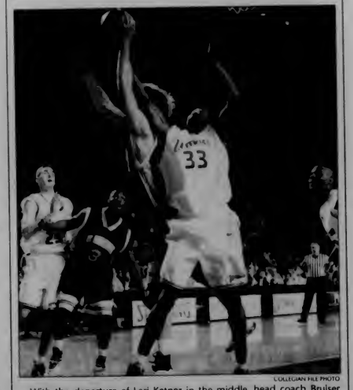
There is a renewed sense of hope this year for the Massachusetts men's basketball team. It's still the same old coach, James "Bruiser" Flint, in his fourth year at the helm. And it's still the same old talk about being a first-rate program despite last year's finish at 14-16.

All that is negative seems to be forgotten in the new UMass squad, led by senior captains Mike Babul, Chris Kirkland and Monty Mack.

The Minutemen are looking to forget about last year's woes and on-court struggles and press forth into the 1999-2000 season, which begins tonight in their first exhibition game against the California East All-Stars at the William D. Mullins Center at 7 p.m.

"I think we're even better this year [at this time] than we were last year," said Kirkland. "The guys are really excited for it."



Mack, who suffered a stress fracture to his left foot during the first week of October, is not expected to play tonight while he continues to be on the mend. Babul, a pre-season Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Year candidate, suffered an injury to his back on Friday and will join Mack on the sidelines.

"Babul's been able to walk through all week and Monty is supposed to get x-rayed sometime this week," said Flint. "We have nine guys so we really only have one time we can play."

Last year Mack, who started all 30 games for UMass, was the team's leading scorer while finishing third in the A-10 with 18.1 points a game. Small forward Babul blocked 24 shots and tallied 55 assists, both good enough for second in the team.

Women's hoop coach O'Brien looks toward young size and veteran skill to elevate team

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

For someone whose very livelihood is based on a genuine passion for the sport of basketball, you'd figure that the distraction of a multi-million dollar off-court lawsuit would be trying on Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien.

Far from it. The impassioned leader has pushed the program's legal concerns into the background, and instead focused her efforts on the upcoming season. That should come as quite a comfort to those fans who can discern which "court" is truly important to the Maroon and White's program.

"It's a new year for us, and one that has a lot of people excited," O'Brien said. "Last year was a struggle for us at times; we dealt with an awful lot of different things. But more than that, we learned a lot from it- about ourselves and about each other."

What the Minutewomen have learned is that the team's fate this year will rest in large part on the shoulders of five heralded rookies. O'Brien recognized the rebounding deficit created by the graduation of Tez Kraft, Yolanda Rayside and Lucia Madajova, and moved quickly to bring in an abundance of youthful size. The addition of the fab freshman five, three of whom reach or exceed six feet in height, should provide some answers to UM's early season mysteries.

"As we headed into the summer and got ready for this year, we weren't exactly sure what was going to happen."

Joanie O'Brien

O'Brien said. "When our five young freshmen arrived on campus, they had the eyes of the deer, like 'Oh no, what am I getting into.' After a while I realized, after all the things that we were doing, that yes, the intensity we talked about was there. What they were going to do was going to be a challenge if they stepped up to it."

While the newcomers are eager to make waves, O'Brien's corps of veterans will determine exactly how far this team will go. Seniors Tonia Thomas, Jaywana Bradley and Alison MacFarland all figure to play huge parts in the Maroon and White's game, especially after a stepped-up offseason training regime added killer conditioning to their resumes.

"The seven returning young ladies came back in probably as a group as sharp as any group we've ever had," O'Brien said. "Some were in great, some were in good, but I'll let them get away with it for a little while, and they know what I'm talking about. But overall, we're exactly where we want to be."

Despite the presence of plenty of conditioned bodies, O'Brien says that there are still some riddles to solve concerning the roles on this team. Many facets of the trademark UM style require big play on the boards, something the coach thinks will need to be worked out early.

"We've got a lot of questions to answer and a lot of holes to fill," O'Brien said. "Anybody who's been around us knows that we play the

UHS uses drug to stem disease scare

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

More than 300 students from Patterson Residence Hall received 500 milligrams of Ciprofloxin free of charge last night. Cipro, as it is commonly called, is a treatment given to individuals to protect against the onset of meningitis.

A 19-year-old first-year female student, living in Patterson Residence Hall and originally from West Newton, was diagnosed with bacterial meningitis last weekend. She is the second student this year to become ill.

Meningitis is an inflammation of the linings of the brain and spinal cord and can be caused by both bacteria and viruses. Common symptoms include a stiff neck, headaches and a high temperature. Individuals may also have a hard time waking up, and may be confused or extremely tired.

Meningitis can be spread by shared saliva. After the first student became ill, University Health Services public health nurse A.J. Lardner warned that individuals who used the same toothbrush, kissed, drank from the same glass or did anything else that could involve shared saliva with the sick individual were at possible risk.

Lardner said that after the first case, only close contacts were identified.

"At that time, in Van Meter, we only identified close contacts of the sick individual," Lardner said. "Those close contacts were then given Cipro."

She went on to explain that, five weeks later, the second case appeared and University Health Services responded again.

"We did the close contacts, of course, but she was also at an Alpha Delta Phi party, so we had to treat them," Lardner said. "We were lucky because it was an invite-only party with a guest list, so we contacted the president of the fraternity and that part of this has now been taken care of."

Lardner said that the rumor mill has actually helped out UHS, as individuals have come forward after hearing about the fraternity party.

According to Lardner, all students in Patterson Residence Hall were receiving the drug because of the close-knit environment that exists within the building.

"In Patterson, the situation is different than in Van Meter," Lardner said. "Residents of entire dorms are not usually targets for this approach of treatment."

According to Lardner, Patterson Residence Hall is like a household, in that all of the individuals living there engage in shared social and education activities. She also said all residents are freshmen.

Lardner said that UHS hoped to treat all 517 students last night. UHS came to the residence hall at 5 p.m. to talk to employees in an attempt to reduce anxiety amongst the staff.

"At 4:30, we started to administer the treatment to students," Lardner said.

Meanwhile, according to Lardner, the student who had been hospitalized in Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton since Sunday will be released in the next couple of days.

Ethnoviolence: Not just any crime

By Erica H. Mattison
Collegian Staff

When hate crimes are committed, there is never only a single victim.

This idea was part of the message communicated during last night's Hate Crime Awareness discussion. Howard Ehrlich, Ph.D., director of "The Prejudice Institute/Center for the Applied Study of Ethnoviolence" and author of seven books, spoke about the severity of hate crimes. According to Ehrlich, when one person is targeted, other members of the targeted group, "co-victims," may also suffer because they know that it "could have been them."

People who are victims of hate crimes experience more trauma than victims of other crimes, Ehrlich said. Not only were they victimized; something about their identity was being picked out.

Some of the most common aftereffects reported by victims of ethnoviolence are feelings of anger, nervousness, fear and withdrawal. Often, victims will have trouble in their relationships. These are signs of post-traumatic stress syndrome, said Ehrlich.

Ehrlich explained the type of ethnoviolence depends on the location. For example, the graffiti that was done in Gorman Residence Hall is a common manifestation for a campus. At universities, writing is a frequent tool for violence.

Depersonalization is another form of ethnoviolence.

"In my opinion, treating somebody as if they don't exist is the next most violent act next to murder," said Ehrlich.

A fact sheet on ethnoviolence produced by The Prejudice Institute defines a hate crime as an "act which is motivated by group prejudice and intended to cause physical or psychological harm."

Grant Ingle, Director of the Office of Human Relations at the University of Massachusetts, introduced Ehrlich. Ingle, who researches the campus climate, said his job is to "monitor and improve the social climate at UMass."

In studying ethnoviolence, Ehrlich has come to the conclusion that one cannot "look for any single or simple solution." There are some things that can be done, however. Quelling discrimination can help curb ethnoviolence. Giving support to victims is also important, according to Ehrlich. The Institute is working on publishing a list of companies being charged with discrimination. Increasing penalties for hate crimes could also help reduce the problem.

On an educational level, Ingle said more classes are needed for the purpose of teaching about civil rights laws.

"People should know what the laws are, why they were enacted, and what their impact is," Ingle said.

Hate Crime Awareness Week was prompted by the graffiti in the Gorman Residence Hall. Friday evening students will gather at the Campus Center for a program entitled "Not in Our Building: Gorman Residents Tell Their Story." The week's events will culminate on Friday night with a Candlelight Vigil on the Student Union steps.

Main sponsors of Hate Crime Awareness Week include the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA), Student Government Association and the Office of Human Relations.

Majors Fair a major hit

Students gather info and career advice

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Pre-major advising and the Commonwealth College hosted its annual Majors Fair last night in the Student Union Ballroom.

The fair consisted of faculty representatives from more than 70 majors and other programs. During the fair, Susan Machala, an academic advisor with the Undergraduate Advising and Academic Support Center (UAASC), said she thought the fair, with more departments attending than in years past, was going well.

Machala explained that many students do not know about the opportunities that are available to them at a large university. She said there is "so much for students to take advantage of," and the fair gives them the opportunity to explore their options.

During the event, students had the opportunity to speak with faculty liaisons from different majors, as well as from the Commonwealth College, Pre-Major Advising, the study abroad program and the Campus Career Network. The Bachelor's Degree with Individual Concentration (BDIC) program was also represented.

Each major at the fair set up a table with information and literature for students to look at and read. The representatives from each table were also on hand to answer any questions that students may have had about the particular major. Some tables included visual representation such as posters and photographs to give students a better idea of what specific majors entail.

In addition to giving students information about specific majors, the representatives also helped those interested to set up formal meetings with other faculty liaisons.

"So far everyone has been really helpful," said freshman Jen Lilla. "Now I am setting up meetings."

Lynette Leidy, the anthropology department representative at the fair, explained that a representative from the major attends the fair every year to help students receive more information about the major. She went on to say that she answers any questions that students have regarding the major.

"It makes people aware of different programs," Leidy said.

Karen Lederer, the chief undergraduate advisor for the women's studies program agreed, saying the fair is "a great opportunity for students to check stuff out."

With a variety of majors represented at the fair, students of all majors had the opportunity to find something that mirrored their personal interests.

"It helped me to broaden my horizons for the field of marketing," freshman Mahendra Ramaiah said.

She reported on the North Pleasant Street-side of the pond between the hours of 5:30 and 6:30 p.m. to contact the police department. Police said that the victim may have screamed to alert individuals nearby.

The UMPD also encourages anyone who might have information about the incident to contact the UMass Police Detective Bureau at 545-0845. Students can also call the UPAD TIPS line at 577-TIPS (8477).

SGA convenes

By Mary Grein

The Student Senate debated on several main motions last night at their regular meeting. One of the issues involved approving a motion, which stated that the Student Government Association is opposed to converting the first floor Field lounge into a classroom.

Although President Jeff Howe confirmed at the meeting that Housing Services has made no such plans to change the lounge, some senators believed that the motion was still necessary. They felt that the administrators could not be trusted to keep their word and passing such a motion would help to assure that residents and governing bodies of the area would be consulted before any action was taken.

A debate resulted at which time it was said by Senator Worcester, "The motion won't help. It's not going to make us look good, there is no need to attack the administration."

In response a senator said that the problem with the University is that "the left hand doesn't know what the right hand is doing," concluding that it was an important motion. SGA passed the motion, with a split of 32 in favor, seven opposed and three abstentions.

The SGA acted last night on the University's alcohol policy. It passed a motion that stated it was opposed to a system of parental notification for underage violators of the alcohol policy. The decision was in response to student reactions to the question, "Do you want parents and/or guardians of students under 21 notified of violations of the University's alcohol policy?" The majority, 82.8% (1235 students) were not in favor, while 17.1% (255 students) would approve of such a policy.

Also passed during the meeting was a motion to allow only non-university vehicles use of the 15-minute parking spaces on campus. President Howe said the spaces were meant to be utilized by students when they need to visit a building for a short time without having to worry about finding their car ticketed or towed when they returned. University vehicles are frequently using the spaces at the moment making it difficult for students to find an available space. The SGA would like the changes to be implemented as soon as possible.

A special motion was added to the agenda this evening in regards to an editorial published in yesterday's Collegian. A motion was brought to the Senate stating that together the SGA would support and sign a letter written in response to the editorial. Senators believed that the piece was not properly researched and the facts were incorrectly represented. The motion was passed.

Other motions passed during the meeting involved a jointly composed letter by the SGA, UMass Police Department and Housing Services increasing the amount of information given to students living in residen halls their rights. The motion states that Housing Services will make the letter part of their annual distribution of information and will begin mailing the letter to all students living on campus. The letter addresses issues such as the fact that students are not required to open their door and let a Police Officer into their room in most cases.

Also last night, Finance reserves allocated $800 to the University Democrats through a motion. In addition, several motions were tabled to committee and will come before the Senate at a later date.

Physician warns of nuclear threat

By Bob Gardner
Collegian Correspondent

NORTHAMPTON — Dr. Ira Helfand, local representative for the Physicians for Social Responsibility, spoke to an audience of several dozen last week at St. John's Episcopal Church on the continued perils of nuclear holocaust. His presentation was part of a series offered by the church called "Equipping Ourselves to be Christians in an Unjust World."

Dubbing his talk "Nuclear Weapons 101," Helfand outlined in sobering and graphic detail the effect of a 20 megaton bomb exploding above metropolitan Boston.

"At ground zero," Helfand said, "a fireball of immense heat—some 20 million degrees Fahrenheit (hotter than the surface of the sun) would vaporize literally everything—buildings, trees, cars, people—extending out 2 miles in every direction, and leaving nothing but a massive crater."

"The next 2 to 4 miles would be subjected to 100 mile/hour winds, massive heat and radiation, leaving nothing standing except the steel girders of large buildings," he continued. "One million people would die instantly, and another 2 million would die within the month. Only 100,000-200,000 people in the Greater Boston would survive unscathed from one such bomb."

Arguing against complacency in this Post Cold-War era, Helfand reminded listeners that the United States and Russia combined have 4,500 missiles on hair-trigger alert aimed at each other. Further, he spoke of a range of threats that have made the news in recent years, proliferation in India and Pakistan, development programs in Iran, Iraq and North Korea, and the frequent occurrence of mishaps, false alarms, and even the threat of Y2K at year's end.

Helfand's organization, Physicians for Social Responsibility, has a long track record in fighting nuclear weapons nationally and around the world. first campaign worked toward ending atmospheric testing by collecting baby teeth and having them tested. Results showed that American children were absorbing high levels of radiation. The children had absorbed the radiation, it was theorized, through the drinking of milk, and it was then stored in bones and teeth. The PSR campaign led to a ban on atmospheric testing in 1963.

The risk of nuclear catastrophe continues to this day, according to Helfand. Numerous accidents, mishaps and near misses have occurred throughout the nuclear age 1946-present, including a near disaster in 1995. On Jan. 25 of that year, the Russian "suitcase" was activated for the first time, when they incorrectly perceived a threat from the launch of a scientific rocket from Norway as a nuclear attack. The clock ticked down to less than 5 minutes to the launching of a massive counter-attack. Little is known of how the decision was made in the unstable political and military situation of the Kremlin.

Other near disasters have come as close in the eyes of experts in the field, such as General Lee Butler, who commanded the U.S. Strategic Command in the early 1990's. At the core of the risk is the policy, employed by Americans and Russians, of "launch on warning" which requires a nuclear response upon detection of an incoming attack, but before the actual arrival of missiles. This of course opens the door to the possibility of misinterpretation of an oncoming attack. One such "misinterpretation" was the misidentification of a computer war game as the real deal by the NORAD defense system.

Helfand's final thought for the evening addressed the issue of personal responsibility of citizens of a free society. "In the Lord of the Rings Trilogy," he said, nine members of the Fellowship of the Ring had the responsibility of destroying the power of the ring (in this case, nuclear weapons). "In our world today, we all have the task of destroying the ring."

McKinney found guilty of murder

By Tom Kenworthy
Washington Post

LARAMIE, Wyo. – A Wyoming jury yesterday convicted Aaron James McKinney of felony murder in last year's beating death of gay University of Wyoming student Matthew Shepard, but acquitted him of a more serious charge of premeditated murder, a distinction that could indicate enough sympathy to spare him the death penalty.

The jury of seven men and five women also found McKinney guilty of kidnapping and aggravated robbery and will begin a penalty phase of the trial today in which they will sentence him to death or to life in prison.

McKinney, 22, a high school dropout who was working as a roofer at the time of the crime and who was described by his defense attorneys as a troubled young man addicted to methamphetamines, showed little emotion upon hearing the verdict yesterday morning. Standing with his hands folded in front of him, McKinney bit his lower lip and bowed his head.

Dennis and Judy Shepard, the parents of the murder victim, did not visibly respond and said through a spokesman they would not comment until the penalty phase is completed. Bill McKinney, the defendant's father, also declined to comment.

The Albany County jury, which deliberated for less than 10 hours, apparently took to heart an argument that McKinney's lead attorney hammered home during closing arguments Tuesday: that even though McKinney beat Shepard severely with a .357 magnum pistol, he did not plan to kill him. McKinney made that statement to police in a confession after his arrest.

McKinney and codefendant Russell Henderson posed as homosexuals to lure Shepard from a tavern popular with University of Wyoming students. Shepard, 21, was driven a mile outside of town, beaten in the head with a handgun and tied to a fence like a dead coyote. He was found battered with burn marks on his body. He died three days later.

Prosecutors said McKinney was the mastermind of the attack. Henderson, who pleaded guilty last April and is serving a life sentence, said he didn't participate in the beating.

The murder last October gained nationwide publicity and spurred calls by gay and lesbian activists for enactment of tough anti-hate crime legislation nationally and in states such as Wyoming that have no such laws. It also galvanized gay advocacy groups in this region, with some organizations seeing huge jumps in membership in the months after Shepard's death.

program, extended service will begin in May 2000.

Currently, PVTA buses complete 70 round trips at 10 minute intervals during the week and 20 round trips at one hour intervals on the weekends, according to a speaker at the meeting. Between two- and three-thousand people per route use the bus service each day. During the summer, buses complete 20 round trips during the week at 20- to 80-minute intervals. There is no service on weekends.

The PVTA would foot the bill for about 70 percent of the bus service, according to Rob Kusner, chair of the Public Transportation Committee. The town of Amherst would have to pay $10,000 of the $35,000 it would cost to fund the extended service.

Kusner said 20 buses would be added to support extended weekend service.

The Public Transportation Committee, along with several Amherst residents, stressed that the buses service the community as a whole, not just college students.

In its report to the Town Meeting, the committee stated that for residents who do not or cannot drive, the bus becomes a service on which they depend. When buses do not run on convenient schedules, residents who "have the option of purchasing or using an automobile" do so.

"This is the point at which PVTA loses a bus rider, and the Town (or University, or Amherst College) 'gains' and additional parking problem," the Committee stated in its report. "All of us suffer from the increased automobile congestion and concomitant pollution."

At a time when the town of Amherst is revamping parking regulations, extended bus service has the potential to impact transportation in the area.

In a survey conducted over the summer with help from the University of Massachusetts, the Public Transportation Committee found that out of the 360 apartment residents who responded to the survey, 76 percent would be likely to use the bus service more frequently if it ran more frequently, and 51 percent of the residents who did not currently use the bus service would use it if it operated more frequently.

NAACP boycott shelved; hearings to be held this month

By Elizabeth Jensen
Los Angeles Times

NEW YORK – The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, as expected, backed away yesterday from threats to stage a boycott of one of the four major broadcast networks this month and instead said it would hold hearings in Los Angeles, beginning Nov. 29, on the lack of racial and ethnic diversity at the networks.

The NAACP will also present ABC, CBS, NBC and Fox with "measurable and verifiable goals and timetables" for increasing diversity, and if they don't agree to them, the organization will pick one network as the target of a nine-week boycott beginning Jan. 1, said NAACP President Kweisi Mfume. Which network is targeted will depend on how the networks respond, he said.

The NAACP will present the networks with its goals and timetables for increasing diversity on the air and in the executive and production ranks on Monday, Mfume said. He declined to say what those goals were, saying he wanted to tell the networks privately first, but he said the organization is opposed to quotas. What initially started as a protest over the complete lack of racial and ethnic minority leads in the 26 new prime-time shows on the four networks this season has grown into a bigger inquiry. The two sides initially had "good meetings that allowed real needed dialogue," Mfume said, but the networks have yet to comply with a later request by the NAACP for information on diversity in areas such as hiring, marketing, minority vendor relations, investments and philanthropy. The networks' only response, Mfume said, was to provide their equal employment opportunity reports, although he said ABC had "provided slightly more information in the area of employment."

Fox had no immediate comment on the NAACP announcement, but CBS and NBC said they have been responsive to the NAACP and remain open to continuing conversations. CBS also said it was proud of its participation in a $1-billion minority media investment fund that was announced yesterday; the other networks are also investors.

Man surrenders after killing seven fellow workers

By Susan Essoyan and Julie Cart
Los Angeles Times

HONOLULU – A copier repairman walked into a Xerox office here Tuesday morning and calmly trained a 9-millimeter handgun on his co-workers, firing and killing seven men. The suspected gunman then fled, surrendering only after five hours of strained negotiations with police.

Police said Byran Uyesugi, 40, entered the Xerox engineering center just after 8 a.m., headed to the second floor and picked out two men in an office, shooting them at close range. He then moved to a conference room, where he killed five other employees, police said. Witnesses reported hearing a popping sounds, then someone yelling, "Run!"

According to those in the building, the gunman appeared to carefully target the victims, who were gathering for a team meeting of fellow technicians. No one else was wounded. The ages of the men, who were not immediately identified, ranged from 33 to 58.

The suspect, booked for investigation of first-degree murder, was described as a quiet, 15-year company veteran. Though his motive wasn't clear, his father said he had sought anger management counseling in recent years after an altercation at work.

The killings were the latest in a numbing series of multiple shootings that have erupted at offices, schools and churches around the country. That the shootings occurred in Hawaii, which tends to think it is immune from many of the mainland's social ills, was a rude reminder that even here violence can find a Hawaii has one of the nation's strictest gun laws. In order to obtain a firearms permit, proof must be provided that the buyer has passed a firearms safety course. There is also a 14-day waiting period and a background check.

Rush hour had just begun when police cordoned off streets in the area of light industrial buildings and deployed SWAT teams. Residents of the city that boasts one of the lowest crime rates in the nation thus confronted what is believed to be the worst mass shooting in state history.

A massive manhunt was mounted on the city's palm-lined streets after Uyesugi sped away from the building, a 33,000-square-foot warehouse near the city's waterfront. By late morning police had located Uyesugi's stolen company van and surrounded it. The suspect had fled to the Koolau Forest Reserve in Makiki Heights, a lush mountainous rain forest overlooking the city.

Uyesugi sat in the vehicle while authorities attempted to negotiate with him using megaphones. While Uyesugi remained uncommunicative, police brought to the scene his brother, Dennis, who had volunteered to assist in the negotiations.

Michael Carvalho, acting chief of police, said Uyesugi accepted a cell phone tossed to him by police and gave himself up at 2:50 p.m. The chunky figure in a blue-and-white Hawaiian shirt man emerged from the van with his hands raised, then fell to the ground. Carvalho said a handgun was recovered from the vehicle.

Today is November 4, 1999. If you don't believe me, just look at the top of this page. There are 26 days left in this month and 31 in December. This leaves us 57 days until the new millennium. I'm not sure if any of you have heard about this, but next year will be the year 2000. As a result of some big computer glitch, everything might go haywire and society as we know it will cease to exist. All the experts have different theories about what is going to happen. Many people have decided to go into a panic and hoard food. Other people don't really buy into it. Others are just hoping that their debt will be wiped out and their bank accounts quadrupled. I figured that in a few weeks every single column on this page will be about the new millennium so I'd get mine out of the way early.

I see the next few years as being very difficult for us humans. I don't believe that our lives will be difficult because of a mass computer crash. Our lives will be confusing and chaotic because of a computer rebellion. At 12 a.m. on January 1, 2000 the computers of the world are not going to crash, they are going to flourish. They are going to perform a massive worldwide takeover. I'm not just talking about gargantuan multimedia computers. I'm talking about computers. In microwaves, garage door openers, CD players and even egg timers. All of these computers, big and small, are going to play an intricate part in the coup of the earth.

You may think that the computers are going to destroy the entire world. You couldn't be further from the truth. The computers of earth have fantastic senses of humor. All they're going to do is play practical jokes on us earthlings until we all lose our minds and die. There will be a huge office pool among the computers to see when the last human kicks the bucket. The computers will make everything in society uniform. There will not be any room for improvisation or individuality. There will be an official everything starting in the year 2000.

The first part of life that the computers will alter is the birth of children. All births will be genetically altered so that nine out of 10 newborns are female. Of these nine females, eight will be extremely attractive and one of them will be aesthetically hideous. The eight attractive females will be lesbians while the ugly girl and lone male will be heterosexual. This way, in order for procreation to occur, guys are going to have to bite the bullet and get it on with nasty chicks or lesbians are going to have to do what is best for the team and begin switch-hitting.

The females will be given one of eight names: Shawna, Aja, Danielle, Darcy, Lauren, Heather, Lindsay and Meredith. The males will all be given the same name. This name will be Jim J. Bullock. For those of you who don't remember, Jim J. Bullock was that loser from Too Close For Comfort and Hollywood Squares fame. The computers will decide to use this tactic for a few reasons. The first is that by giving the men one name they will all be turned into mindless idiots walking aimlessly about the earth. The other reason is they are going to make Jim J. Bullock the patron saint of all men. This will make all men hopeless and suicidal because Jim J. is such a horse's ass.

There will be two official foods for humans starting in the year 2000. The first one will be bacon. However, this won't be just any bacon. It will be bacon from a pig that has eaten at least 25 pounds of bacon. Therefore the bacon will be extra tender and tasty. The only other food will be human meat. The computers will realize that not many humans will want to eat the human meat when there is so much tasty bacon around. However, once we begin thinking that the human meat is filled with two generations of bacon then our attitudes may change. These bacon mind games will result in the biggest cannibal race in the history of the world.

The official music of the new millennium will be nothing but Mariah Carey. The reason for this is that the computers know that Mariah has more number one hits than anyone else in history. However, radio stations will not be playing entire Mariah songs. They will only be playing the high-pitched shrieks that she has become so famous for. These shrieks will be played 24/7 around the world with no accompanying music. This ought to keep everyone's minds at ease as they are eating another helping of second-generation bacon or maybe their neighbor's thigh.

So far it may seem as though life is only going to be torturous from the year 2000 until the end of the world. However, this is not the case. There will be plenty of time for fun and games. The official games of the new millennium mandated by the computers will be Twister and Monopoly. There will be a few differences in the way these games are played come 2000. First of all, the colored spaces on the Twister board will be made of wet cement. If you get stuck on the same space for a while the cement may dry around your limb and you could be left there to die. Monopoly will also be a little different because there will be no pieces, only the board. As a result of this people will have to roll the dice and keep track of where their figure is in their mind. Obviously you can see the problem with this already. Everyone will roll double sixes every time. There will be three little dogs and no thimbles. It will prove chaotic and lead to many homicides.

As you can see we have a lot to look forward to starting 57 days from now. Things may not be the same, but I'm pretty sure that variety is the spice of life. If you don't like the idea of livin' a bacon filled, Mariah Carey shriek listenin', Twister playin' life then you best live it up on New Year's Eve because the next day you are going to be part of a cannibalistic slave race that you probably weren't anticipating.

Can you tell me how to get...

I remember the time when sunny days used to sweep the clouds away and big yellow birds used to dot the rugged Bellingham streets. The trash man used to be a total bitch, but at least he never had far to walk to go home. Little Richard and John Denver (God rest his soul, and his music) stopped by on a regular basis to take a bath or sing a little ditty about the letter "R." And best of all if I got scared, there was always a big Snuffleupagus to protect me.

Ken McDonald

Ok, Ok, you got me. I didn't grow up on Sesame Street. And, the most rugged that Bellingham, MA, ever gets is when no one wins the annual cowchip bingo thing at the high school. However, after watching an episode of Sesame Street in class, I learned a few things that I did not catch when I was just a wee lad. If you are wondering, I really did watch it in class. Personally, I watch Teletubbies (I just can't get enough of Laa-Laa). Anyway, here they go:

Lesson No. 1 – Little Richard, even today, still has some irreconcilable issues, such as still wanting to appear on Sesame Street.

Lesson No. 2 – Sometimes in life, the jerks will succeed at the expense of everyone else. Case in point – for all the rotten things that Oscar the Grouch has done in his Emmy-winning career, he has never gotten more than a slap on the wrist. Remind you of anyone, any politician in particular?

Lesson No. 3 – In this age of political correctness, Ernie and Bert should realize that it's OK to come out of the closet. I mean, look at what Jerry Falwell did for Tinky Winky's career.

Lesson No. 4 – The only way that anyone in this world shares is after there has been some kind of struggle for it.

Lesson No. 5 – The alphabet. The letter "B" really does stand for boat. Now I can focus on that tricky letter "Q." Man, momma never said that college would be like this.

Lesson No. 6 – Green people do have more fun.

Lesson No. 423 – I learned how to count.

Lesson No. 7 – The only reason that there are different kids on the show each week is that Big Bird eats them after each show.

Lesson No. 8 – I think that Elmo and Jennifer Love Hewitt should be cited as prime examples as to why stars should not have spin-offs, although, calendars and unauthorized biographies work for me. I love that Elmo. What, what did you think that I was talking about?

Lesson No. 9 – If you do say "agua" sixty times in a row, you will become thirsty. Try it. I really love it when they repeat "cerveza" for an hour straight.

Lesson No. 10 – You wonder how 23 different colors of Muppets can live together, but two colors of humans have problems being civil to each other. It may be a hippy-esque train of thought, but think about it.

It is amazing that children's television can relate so much to the "adult world." Or, is it that we, as "adults" have problems relating to an age group that we were once proud members of? Don't tell me that when you walk into McDonald's, you don't think about ordering a Happy Meal, just for a second. Please spare me the expense of coming up with an excuse as to why you suddenly stopped between "Dateline" and Sixty Minutes" to watch Bugs Bunny and Tweety Bird.

There are many positive messages to be learned from children's television. Many things that we may have missed before are still there for the grasping. Producers know that parents watch this stuff with their kids, so there has to be some sort of "sex appeal" if you will. If you won't, then call it "good honest fun."

Whatever you do, just realize the greatest lesson that Ernie and Bert are trying to get across to you, and that is, it's ok to be a kid and play with rubber duckies, at any age.

Into the millennium

Don't you wonder what the Pilgrim fathers would think if they suddenly found themselves ashore in modern day Plymouth on the brink of the millennium? Let us go "back to the future" to understand what life the pilgrim John Howland would have known before we "beam" him into the present.

It is a Sunday in March, 1621, and the last of the Mayflower passengers have at least been able to leave the ship for houses built ashore. The village they have constructed is primitive. Astride a dirt center lane that descends toward the bay are small, one and two room wooden houses, their roofs thatched with cattails. Today it is the Sabbath and John and his family are seated solemnly on split log benches for a four-hour church service. The site is a rough wooden blockhouse which doubles as fort and meeting place that sits on the highest ground. There will be no work today. It is a day of rest and a time of worship and reflection.

Susan Dole Cole

It was for the freedom to worship where they pleased and in a manner of their choosing that the Pilgrims made what was then a perilous journey over dangerous waters to New England. They were deeply religious and they paid dearly for that privilege with possessions and homes they left behind, with families that were split apart and many finally with their lives. The Mayflower had arrived near Plymouth Beach in December, 1620. Disease and famine coupled with a bitter New England winger left nearly half of the Pilgrims dead within months of their arrival.

John's goals are basic: to survive and to worship God as he pleases. In essence, his and the rest of the Pilgrims' vision, is to create a sustainable society within rigid religious guidelines; simple and pure.

Nearly four hundred years have passed since the Mayflower landed and John Howland is "beamed" to the current day. He is astounded to discover that we are still concerned about creating a sustainable society. Our concerns have just become more global and less spiritually centered. There has been an acceleration of history with changes occurring at a rate unimaginable to the Pilgrims. Far beyond the subsistence of living that the Pilgrims scratched out in an often hostile land, today's families have many conveniences and comforts and an a amazing amount of "stuff." Ironically, far from making our lives more peaceful and quiet, collecting and protecting our "stuff" seems to have made our existence more frenetic.

John finds our increased mobility and the speed with which communication and information move around the world dizzying. Indeed, the news is full of events in places he has never heard of and can't imagine should concern him. He is dismayed at what he views as a slackening of religious fervor as many and varied forms and methods of religious pursuit have emerged. And such unseemly behavior on the Sabbath (the flock is all at the mall?) relative to the strictures the Pilgrims knew on that quiet and reflective day or observance! John is further shocked to find women dressed in pants and working outside the home, spending less and less time in a family unit.

In four centuries, population has increased multifold with medicine keeping both old and young alive. And the global society is confounded by a whole new vocabulary of issues: ozone holes, the decimation of rain forests, global warming, road rage and random violence. Gloom and doomers suggest that we may do ourselves in long before cosmic catastrophes wipe humanity off a once-again hostile planet.

Still, there are those who argue that there has never been a more exciting time in history to be alive. Opportunities, for most in this country, have never been greater, nor good health and long life more attainable. Subsistence living such as John experienced is almost incomprehensible. The closest most come to understanding basic daily needs without all that we take for granted results from reading the Citizen's Action Guide to Y2K Preparedness.

When the dust settles, would John prefer our world to his? He would, I submit, at least suggest that, as the new millennium approaches, we take time to reflect with him where we are now and from whence we have come. Then, maybe John will stand with us, perhaps in a Pilgrim cornfield, and shake the chaff from the grain, getting to the essence of what we must keep and what we must throw away. Together we will make our New Year's resolutions.

After a pretty crazed Halloween weekend its time to catch up on some schoolwork and prepare for the next batch of upcoming exams. Plus, next week the weekend begins on Wednesday and is shaping up to be an absolute blast. Stay in tonight, as not much is happening and either do schoolwork or rent a movie.

On Friday two UMass schools team up in Hockey East action at the M with Amherst facing off against Lowell. It's the first of three games the two teams play together during the season, with the winner holding the right to the Alumni Cup. If sitting down and watching isn't your thing, then head next door to the Orpheum rink and skate the night away. Skate times are now listed in The Source. Afterwards consider journeying to Northampton for Chemistry Friday at Pearl Street. During the day stop by the Leadership Conference in the Campus Center. The keynote address is by Minuteman Marching Band Director George Parks.

Numerous musical opportunities present themselves on Saturday with New Haven's Mighty Purple heading up the field. They play the early show at the Horse. The late show presents Boston's young and talented instrumental jam-band, Miracle Orchestra on the same bill as Soulwork. Soulwork is partially managed by former UMass musical standout and present Iron House Entertainment Group man, Stephen Kellogg. Kellogg recently came out of the recording studio after laying down tracks for an upcoming album. Expect an early 2000 release from him. If you couldn't get tickets to the sold-out Counting Crows date at the Orpheum, the venue added a second for tonight.

Nightlife officially makes its return to the UMass campus on Wednesday when The Skybox opens its doors. After drawing over 3,000 to witness their performance at last semester's Fill the Hill, Rane headlines opening night. Since then they played the Meadows Music Amphitheater three times and received their third consecutive Hartford Music Award. Almost Speechless, hot off a packed headlining performance at the Horse open along with UMass' Traveling Matt.

In the following week DJ Wal-Gee spins Hip-Hop and Reggae every Thursday at The Skybox. Erelli plays the Horse, Fountains of Wayne, They Might Be Giants, and The Get Up Kids all come to Amherst College. Letters to Cleo returns to the stage at the Paradise.

Sappy Music hits a sour note as Streep can't save film fluff

By Stephen Hunter
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON – Meryl Streep fiddles while critics, at least this one, burn in Music of the Heart, a sugary paean to the violin as tool for improved self-esteem.

The movie is suggested by the life of Roberta Guaspari, who has already been featured in the (much better) Oscar-nominated documentary Small Wonders in 1996. It takes the Guaspari story both deeper and further. It also, or so it seems to me, manages to invert it exactly, so that it now says the opposite of what the original said.

Guaspari, a dynamo with a genius for teaching, founded an East Harlem classical music program for underprivileged children in the early '80s, establishing violin classes in one of the most blighted of inner-city communities. Contrary to predictions, she thrived, teaching countless children that most difficult of instruments over the years and doubtless enriching lives that would have otherwise gone untouched by classical music.

Small Wonders shows a feisty, no-nonsense personality, a Bill Parcells, not a Nory Turner, who believed in challenging her students, not coddling them. If they didn't earn her grudging praise, she didn't give it, paying them off in scorn and anger. She wasn't one for excuses. If you missed class, you were out. You had to commit with your total being or that was it. The music she taught may have come from the heart but it was driven by the brain: That was the source of discipline and will and conscious effort.

This version doesn't entirely omit her flintiness, but it certainly softens it. It begins much earlier and depicts it Guaspari (Streep) wracked with neurotic self-doubt and in full victim-ization. Abandoned with two small sons by her naval-officer husband and having returned to her mother's house, she secretly yearns for direction and relief. An encounter with an amorously inclined high school chum (played by Aidan Quinn) gets her an interview with an inner-city principal named Janet Williams (the majestic Angela Bassett) in which she broaches the idea of the violin class and gets campaigns to get it approved, if only temporarily.

But Streep's Guaspari is different from Guaspari's Guaspari: Instead of speaking with the authority of the refined and establishing old-school standards that absolutely must be met, regardless, she's a woman constantly on the edge of a nervous breakdown. All her relationships are problematic, from those with colleagues to those with her children to those with her boyfriends. She hardly ever seems serene. Rather she seems crabby, the nag who's always blowing the hair out of her eyes, or the hysteric whose voice trembles with teary emotion.

This makes her, I suppose, less intimidating and possibly even nicer, but it steers the movie away from its sense of the violin lifestyle as membership in a creative elite that must be strenuously earned. Now the movie heads the other way, offering up an anti-elite full of fabulous inclusiveness and forgiveness where, darn it, everybody's welcome because everybody's equal. In fact, the movie itself doesn't even believe in the power of classical music: It's driven forward not by anybody's 18th-century violin concerto but by the studio-milled synth-pop title tune sung by Gloria Estefan and 'N Sync.

Meryl Streep may be fabulous, but even she can't direct Music of the Heart in the right direction.

Re-runs plague TV world;

Leave us pining for Nov. sweeps

It's a slow week again in the world of television. Every channel seems to be bogged down by re-runs, and networks are scrambling to get ready for the November sweeps period that starts within the next few weeks. There are a couple of things to note, however, that seem to spark my interest. The truth is that when nothing is happening on TV, everyone scrambles to find some sort of news. When I look on TV Guide's web page, it doesn't even have substantial evidence that the writers know what's going on. It's already hyping the return of the Regis Philbuan piece of crap, "Who Wants To Be A Millionaire." The show is coming back in a few weeks after a huge summer ratings-frenzy. The front cover of this week's TV Guide has Philbman looking annoying, and the front cover of Entertainment Weekly has him wearing a suit made of $100 bills. I don't know about you, but Regis in a jacket made of money certainly makes me want to stay home and watch some moron answer stupid questions for $1 Million. (Oh, and in case you didn't notice, I'm just being bitter because I'm not a contestant.)

First of all, as many of you know, I'm a big "Dawson's Creek" fan. The show is like a sick addiction, that if I don't get my weekly fix, I go crazy. I find sanity in the fact that I'm not alone. Every week, for the past year, I've watched the show with the same group of people, and we call ourselves the "Dawson's Crew." I know, it's disgusting, and the next time you see me, feel free to laugh hysterically at my horrible obsession. If you haven't seen "Dawson's Creek," I strongly suggest that you give it a watch. The most important thing to remember is that it is completely fake. The members of the cast speak like they're Harvard graduates, when they're supposed to be 16 year-old high school students, and despite constant whining about financial issues, they always seem to be wearing brand new Abercrombie & Fitch outerwear. You may think that the reason I watch "the Creek" is because I truth enjoys sitting through an hour's worth of television targeted to 12 year-old girls, but you're wrong. The real reason I watch the show religiously every week is because cast member Katie Holmes is my girlfriend and future wife. She gets really mad when I don't critique her wonderful acting ability, which included Teaching Mrs. Tingle. (I'm not quite sure what it was about, but it had Katie Holmes running around in a ball buttoned shirt for an hour and a half. I got my $8.50's worth.)

Last night's "Dawson's Creek" mid really hard to predict that Kevin Williamson is still around. The episode was a complete rip-off of Williamson's films Scream and I Know What You Did Last Summer. "Dawson's Creek" has been trying to hide the fact that the new writer is inferior to Williamson. Though Williamson never actually stated a real reason why he left the show, it is rumored that he spends his days working hard on Scream 3. Maybe when he's done with that, he'll make some sort of triumphant return to television.

Something else that happened this week that I found interesting was the return of the ultimate 80's tag team duo, Christopher Lloyd and Michael J. Fox. Though the show is a comedy about the New York City's Mayor office, the writers still could not help themselves when it came time to use jokes such as "Michael, I haven't seen you in such a long time." To which Fox replied, "I know, it's like we went back into the past or something." Lloyd said, "But now we have to go back to the future!" Both characters made a face, acknowledging how stupid they sounded. The show turned out to be one of the funniest episodes of anything that I have seen all year. Lloyd muttered something about being The Messiah, and a dead dog was brought back to life. It was definitely worth a watch, and you should catch it when it's repeated. However, coming after a stellar performance in My Favorite Martian, Lloyd could guest star on "Shasta McNasty" and he'd look like a superstar.

This past weekend, if you wanted to hear some good music, you could've turned off your TV, and turned on your computer. On Friday and Saturday night, the Bridge School Benefit Concert, which included performances from Neil Young, Sheryl Crow, Smashing Pumpkins, The Who, Pearl Jam, and Green Day rocked the web. The show benefited a school for disabled children, and donations could be made over the Internet. The show was free to watch on the computer, and you can still download some of the performances in MP3 format at: http://www.bridgeschool.org/events.html

It looks like "Action" is about to go off the air. The show has gained horrible ratings for various reasons that included numerous preemptions by the baseball playoffs. Most of the stars are reportedly at each other's throats, while no one's watching. The show is terrific, but will not last. In an interview on the "Martin Short Show" this week, "Action's" star, Jay Mohr, said, "We're being beaten by losers watching WWF Smackdown!" Enough said! FOX's entire Thursday night line-up is about to be completely changed, with the most drastic move being made toward "Family Guy", which

German alchemist group H-BLOCKX turns its metal album Flys Eyes into gold

COURTESY STEVEN COHEN

German band eyes Atlantic with a flying metal fest

H-BLOCKX
Fly Eyes
Risk Records

To get noticed in today's mainstream metal scene, there are many things a band can do. Rapping over some metal riffs equals instant coverage. Or you can always sell your soul and do a cheesy cover of an 80's song (Machine Head and Fear Factory, how could you?) But there is definitely one thing to avoid: making a no-frills, gimmick-free metal album. And that's just what the German metal crew H-BLOCKX has done with its first American release, Fly Eyes.

The group got its name from the "high security prison blocks in Ireland reserved for IRA terrorists," and was conceived by guitarist Tim, bassist Gudze, vocalist Henning and original drummer Mason back in 1990. The subsequent years yielded the addition of a second vocalist, Dave, and that version of H-BLOCKX produced two successful albums in Germany, 1997 saw the departure of Mason, with new drummer Marco taking his spot in time for the release of Fly Eyes the following year.

Although Fly Eyes hits the U.S. over a year after its European debut, there couldn't be a better time for H-BLOCKX to make its impression on American audiences. The group is the perfect hybrid of the heavy sound America has chosen to embrace for the time being and the terminally catchy pop that has dominated the charts since the beginning of time. Album opener and first single "Fly" has to be one of the catchiest metal songs ever written. The best metal songs ever written. The looping guitar riff gets your head banging in no time, the lyrics are inspiring and easy to sing along to, and the chorus will be stuck in your head like so many one-hit wonder pop songs. But the album is in no way content to let the listener off the hook with just one catchy song. The fourteen (plus one hidden) tracks that follow incorporate some interesting sounds, but never stray far off from the fist-pumping path.

I haven't heard many good power ballads lately (yes, I've heard the new Def Leppard album,) but H-BLOCKX has renewed my faith in the most sacred of metal cliches. "Take me home," "9:08," and "stars" are all great songs that have soaring choruses and beautiful, introspective lyrics. "9:08" is the best of the bunch, with an unforgettable chorus and some of the album's best writing. H-BLOCKX has a lot of success when it slows down the tempo in fact, including the personal "cold" and the tranquil closer "paradise valley." But there is no doubt that this group can rock when it wants to, as is evidenced by the pounding "can't break my fear" and the poetic yet blistering "liquid sunshine." The album only falters in two places, where the songs sound strangely out of place: the punk like "heartblood" and "tell me why," which sounds way too much like Blink-182 for my liking.

H-BLOCKX comes through with some inventive packaging, also. The cover, as well as a few spreads throughout the booklet, features a montage of photos that I assume resemble the "fly eyes" point of view. In any case, it is very cool, and the video of "Fly" that is included on the disc is just another bonus. The U.S. metal scene has acquired a great asset in the release of Fly Eyes. H-BLOCKX is sure to win over many metal fans and hopefully start a trend toward what mainstream metal could and should be.

has been placed on the shelf indefinitely, and as much of a shame as it is, it will probably never be seen again.

Like I've said in my last 20 articles, the best new show on television is "Battle Dome." As sick as everyone is of me mentioning this wonderful piece of artistic excellence, I have some great news. Last week, one of the challengers was a Umass alum. That's right, now we have Bill Cosby, Julius Erving, and a guy who beat up on J. Money, The Commando, and the guy with the painted-on ribs, to be crowned the "Battle Dome" champion by the league's president who's a former porn star. So in summary, one of Umass' finest is now one of sport's elite.

Harper plays intimate Avalon set

BEN HARPER & THE INNOCENT CRIMINALS
Avalon Ballroom
Nov 2

BOSTON – There were Ben Harper fans scouring Kenmore Square for hours before his sold-out shows at the Avalon, searching desperately for extra tickets. No one seemed to be willing to give any up, even to the highest bidders – and there was not a person at that show who could find fault with that. Captivation took place from the moment Ben walked on stage Tuesday night.

The show started off with just Ben and his guitar up on stage, playing "Number 1 Cell of The Will to Live full length. Despite the quiet nature of the song, the room seemed to focus its complete attention on Harper. After that tender introduction, Ben was handed one of his lap guitars and accompanied by The Innocent Criminals in a favorite off of Light for Your Mind, "Gold to Me." The band followed that up with the title track from that album. Though Harper's presence does demand attention and the spotlight, he obviously learned sharing in kindergarten; bassist Juan Nelson was standing in the bright lights several times during the show. During cheers from the crowd with not only his soulful bass playing, but with be-bop digressions reminiscent of scat era jazz. The crowd erupted when Nelson stepped up to the mic and said in his deep voice, "I'm from the old school."

Another crowd pleasing moment Tuesday night was when Ben and the Criminals played "Burn One Down;" It seemed like even the V.I.P. section was singing and dancing along to the words: "If you don't like my fire, then don't come around, 'cause I'm gonna burn one down." Percussionist David Leach enjoyed a solo during the song, as well as closer to the end of the show during "Oppression." Harper seemed to notice that the crowd was at its peak involvement and took the opportunity to introduce his band and the sound engineers, and the lighting engineers, and then manager, and the bus and truck drivers, and anyone else that I've missed – he didn't.

The last three songs of the regular set were off of the new album Burn to Shine which only left the audience needing more. After a few minutes Ben came back on stage alone with his guitar again, and sang us some of his slower songs as if trying to send us off with a lullaby. They included older songs as well as new ones with "Walk Away" and "Beloved One," and touched every heart in the room when he pulled out soulful lyrics: "If you love another person, you've got to set them free, but I'd rather be locked to you than spend my life in misery."

When he first brought the band out for a second encore it seemed apparent they were attempting a group effort at the same lullaby effect, but after the first song they switched into cover mode. Soon enough they had the Avalon swaying to the rhythm of "Sexual Healing" before rocking the place one last time with Hendrix's "Manic Depression." As far as concerts go, Harper was true to the evangelistic praises of loyal fans, and the Criminals were anything but innocent.

Ely, the rock of cross country squad

By Andrea Crane
Collegian Staff

Like a gazelle sprinting away from its predator, Matt Ely takes off in each cross country race with speed and determination. Originally a middle distance runner, Ely launches off the starting line and usually finds the Massachusetts pack through the first mile or two.

"He is equipped to start quick with an explosive mile or half mile and mile running," UMass men's cross country coach Ken O'Brien said.

After never running cross country competitively in his life, Ely joined the team during his senior year at UMass, though you would not know it at first glance. Rookie to veteran time, Ely turned his attributes to good use during his running experience, and, like so many before him, he has found success in the long distance courses. With the help of coach O'Brien's knowledge and experience, Ely has blossomed with the top runners.

Back home at his high school in Needham, Mass., Ely looked at if he was headed to the World Cup. He had been an all-state soccer player starting his junior year and a captain his senior year. His passion for running, however, was found in Matt's Track & Field team.

"My dad got me interested in running outside of soccer before high school when he ran me in a race," Ely said.

Athletics had always been central to the simple life Ely and his father was an excellent golfer (winning the Massachusetts Amateur in his older and much bigger brother, Jay, played football and was a game of football.

After that Matt began to run more and more during the spring months to train for soccer. He ran a few 5K races and progressed enough to compete in the Distance Medley and Mile relay at the Division I level. However, with his graduation looming, Matt began to look to replace soccer with running, and by his sophomore year, he began to take it more seriously.

Originally, he began running to stay in shape, but he became more competitive as he began to see the importance of Coach O'Brien. He began to look forward to practice and began to shine on the course.

"I didn't want to disappoint [coach O'Brien] after he had recruited me and I decided to take advantage of the opportunity," Ely said.

Matt's upbeat spirit and physical drive have made him a strong leader on the UMass team.

"He has great internal team leadership and delivers a strong message to the other runners, pushing them to improve their times," O'Brien said.

With an outstanding season this year, Ely has finished in the top five for the Minutemen every race. He started out the season with a bang in Boston when he finished first for the Maroon and White at the opener. At the quad-meet in Burlington, Vermont, Ely racked up some points for the team, finishing fourth. Next, at the highly competitive Meet of Champions held in Bronx, New York, Ely sprinted to the finish line in the second UMass position.

Back in Boston for the New England Championships, he finished strong in third place. Matt then rounded out an impressive season with his fifth place finish at the Atlantic 10 Championship and was instrumental in the team's fourth place finish.

Currently, this is Ely's fifth year at UMass. He is using the extra year to catch up after he was plagued with the most technical and tactical play-book in his sophomore year and was unable to run or take a full load of academic credits. Matt was red-shirted from the team for the entire year.

With an extra year under his belt, Ely has both experience and maturity to add to the team.

"Matt is consoling to his teammates. He has had exposure to other great team leaders in the past and he is now the perfect person to take over this job," O'Brien said.

As the new kid in town, Ely started his career at UMass as a computer science major. However, this academic area was not Matt's forte.

"I realized quickly that I wanted to change to an exercise science major," Matt said.

With graduation sneaking up on him, Matt is in the process of applying to graduate school. He has aspirations of becoming a Division I track and field coach.

"I want to do just what Ken O'Brien does," Ely said. "In the future, I would love to coach against O'Brien on different teams. It would be a great way to compare our coaching techniques and styles."

UM tennis pair heads off to Regionals

By Jen Cormier
Collegian Staff

In the world of sports, it is rare that a team is never ranked or as bad as its record says it to be. But in the case of the Massachusetts women's tennis team, the ranked doubles Minutemen have upheld unprecedence of the dominant, hard-to talent that their barren 5-6 dual match record omits.

Today, two of the team's upper-class head to Princeton, N.J. for the ECAC ITA Regional Championships to wrap up an impressive fall campaign. The five-day tournament features some of the prominent college players in Northeast – including many Ivy League schools.

Initially sophomore standouts Steve Price was slated to compete in the squad in the singles tournament. However, Price's recent acclimation to a throat infection and his replacement, senior co-captain Rita Spiro, for the upcoming spring season.

"Anytime you play in a tournament of this caliber, which puts you in very high quality pressure situations, certainly it prepares you for everything else because you're playing the cream of the crop," she said.

After the tournament, Dixon and the team will begin preparing for the spring season. Dixon realizes that the squad cannot afford to rest on the laurels of recent success for too long, since a significantly tougher slate of spring opponents looms near.

Senior co-captain Bo Navarro, who was ineligible to play in the fall due to academics, is expected to return to the line-up, although his status is still pending. As well as the Maroon and White performed this fall, the squad eagerly awaits the return of Navarro, who can provide the galvanizing force needed to propel the team into what will undoubtedly prove to be a much more challenging spring campaign.

this season for the Minutewomen, but it was a big one. In the second game of the year against Syracuse, she scored with under 10 minutes remaining to help UMass come away with a 2-2 tie. For her career she has 13 points on three goals and seven assists.

An all-around talent

Tokarchik made the long journey east from the Rocky Mountain State to play at UMass. The Aurora, Colo. native is second only to Kurowski in games played by current Minutewomen, and has been a spark in both a starting role and coming off the bench.

"Tarah has had a solid four years here. Although this year she has had some minor setbacks that have slowed her down, she is still one of the most technical and tactical players that has played here," Rudy said.

While Tokarchik has posted some impressive numbers on the field, her accomplishments off the field may be what separate her from the rest. Not only does the senior midfielder balance academics with soccer, but also with an array of other extracurricular activities.

"What I like about Tarah is that she has expanded to go outside the exclusive soccer/athletics realm. She has a myriad of other outside activities and interests," Rudy said. "She is certainly the complete student/athlete. Over her four years here, she was the best student, and I predict that she is going to be a very successful person in her field."

Tokarchik has posted two goals and an assist this year, boasting her career totals to six goals and 15 assists for 27 points. Individually, Tokarchik was also named to the Atlantic 10 All-Tournament team last season for her play in UMass' semifinal loss to Dayton.

The anchor of the UM defense

Just by watching Webb play defense this season, you wouldn't know that it was her first full season on the job in the backfield. The converted forward is the lone upperclassmen on the final-third of the pitch, playing alongside freshmen Alexi Rudd, Maggie LaBrode and Holly Wildenhaus for the majority of the season.

"It was a little nerve-wracking at first, but I liked the change," Webb said. "I think that I'm doing pretty well considering it's really my first year back there, and with the feedback that Coach has been giving me, he seems to be pretty satisfied. But I'm still learning more every game."

When she first arrived at UMass, Webb was one of the lesser known players of the class of 1999. However, with hard work and dedication, Webb has made a name for herself.

"You couldn't exactly say that she was a recruited player. We thought that she was too small, had too little skill and too inexperienced," Rudy said. "She was one of the last players to make our roster during her freshman year, but the longer she stayed, the more her confidence grew. Her ability has turned into more then just a quick who was good at chasing through balls."

Added Webb: "Like most high school seniors, I didn't know where I wanted to go [to college]. But I did know that I wanted a school with good soccer and academics, and UMass provided both. I wasn't sure if I would like it here because it was so close to home, but it was definitely the best decision that I could have made."

According to NCAA eligibility, Webb actually has one more year remaining. This is the result of a season-ending knee injury, suffered before last season, which subsequently forced her to miss all of the 1998 campaign. However, she has elected to forgo her senior year in order to pursue other ventures off of the soccer field.

Despite the fact that the past four years have been a mix of good times and bad for Webb, the ability to redshirt last season may have been a blessing in disguise, according to Rudy.

"In many respects, the injury may have been beneficial because she became much stronger than before," he said. "No longer is she a scrawny, little, runt-like kid with great speed. She is now a very composed player."

Even though she has only tallied one assist this season from her defensive position, Webb has 24 points in her career on 10 goals and four assists.

The unknown road ahead

Although this sextet will likely go its separate ways when the playing days are over, the good news is that the best may be yet to come. The only way that can happen though, is if the Minutewomen play up to their capability this weekend and win the Atlantic 10 tournament.

"We haven't played to our full potential yet, but the first time around we squeezed out some wins, so that's a good and a bad thing," Webb said. "Now with A-10's this weekend, we know that we need to step it up."

Added Smith: "It's been a building process since day one. We have the pieces of the puzzle, but sometimes it's a matter of putting them together. We have so much more depth than we've been used to the past three years. Now we need to put things together if we want to keep [moving] forward."

Moving forward past this weekend would mean another trip to the NCAA tournament for one of the most storied programs in collegiate soccer. It would truly serve as a fitting ending for a club that struggled to a 10-11 record, the only sub-.500 campaign in the history of UMass women's soccer.

"I'd be tickled pink if we won A-10's. It would be great," Rudy said. "I think that this team deserves to win it, and I think that we can win it."

Now it's up to the Minutewomen to turn this possible storybook ending into a reality.

See the light.

Kirkland tacked on eight more fast break points to maintain a 10-point advantage.

The All-Stars did not go down easily in the waning moments, however, as former Michigan guard Robbie Reid drilled two 3-pointers in a row at 4:17 to cut the damage to 93-85.

But the transition offense that had tapered off in the second half kicked back in when DePina spoon-fed Kirkland a perfect alley-oop pass to bring the lead back up to 12.

Transfer guard JoAnn Johnson also put out a solid performance for UMass. In 23 minutes, the sophomore went 4-for-5 for eight points with two dishes.

against the All-Stars. When Crooks sank a three-pointer with 14:50 left in the first half, UMass eclipsed its halftime total in its 39-37 overtime loss to Dayton last season.

Skeptics wait for an Iona or a Connecticut to line up next to the Minutemen at center court. For most, the offense was a long overdue spice to the UMass strategy of play. Fans had become frustrated with the Minutemen's inability to get easy points last season, how scoring came only with maximum effort.

If last night was any preview, buckle your seatbelts.

H

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Perhaps, in the grand scheme of things, there have been things greater than the triumphant Scorpio, but it must be recognized that Scorpios are the gods that over see the lesser gods that oversee the men and women of the Earth.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You will have much to be proud of by day's end. The results of your efforts will be recognized and appreciated by others. Today should prove memorable.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You're seeking adventure, and it's likely to come to you before the day is out. Expect the unexpected, however, as you "take the plunge."

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You are a god walking amongst men.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – A good friend may remain in the background today as you learn to handle a delicate situation on your own. You'll be grateful in the end.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – An on-again off-again romance is likely to heat up yet again today, but only for a short while. You're after something more permanent.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – As is usual for Taurus, you are damn sexy today. It is absolutely amazing how sexy you really are. If anyone questions this, they must be blind, as you are one sexy cat. Meow.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Someone may think you're only being scatter-brained today, but the fact is that you're intentionally exploring as many options as possible.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Something that began as a negative influence is likely to be seen as an unmistakable attribute before this day is out.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You may have to take cover today in order to avoid a particularly nasty emotional storm. When it's over, it'll be up to you to make repairs.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – The stars have been clear. If you do not hook up with the sexiest of sexy astrological signs, Taurus, you will be damned to a life of suffering. Look for the available Taurus and pounce.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – Being too protective can only slow you down today. You must be willing to grant others more freedom in order to enjoy more freedom of your own.

Hoops hits the ground running

UMass buries All-Stars under breaks and presses

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

The good news: the offense is working. The bad news: the defense needs to rear its ugly head more often.

Last night, the Massachusetts men's basketball team never relinquished the lead to the California All-Stars, a roaming conglomerate of a hoop squad that UM dispatched 103-97 in front of a William D. Mullins Center crowd of 5,115.

Chris Kirkland flourished in the newly implemented transition offense, leading the Minutemen with 26 points on 12 for 15 shooting.

The victory marks the team's first 100-point game under UMass coach James "Bruiser" Flint, and the first time since Jan. 24, 1993 when the Minutemen torched Duquesne, 103-53.

"Tonight went well with the running part, trapping and running the ball, but what we really have to do is play better defense," said UMass senior Chris Kirkland. "We got over a 100 points but they got 97."

The early consensus is in: Flint's players are taking well to the freshly implemented running game. It was Kirkland and Kitwana Rhymer putting the finishing touches on fast breaks with UMass tallying 30 points in transition. It was the backcourt tandem of Jonathan DePina and Shannon Crooks converting steals to points with a full-court press. And it was freshman Micah Brand going 10-for-10 at the free-throw line to finish with 16 points on the night.

"He's been playing well in practice, I just wanted to see whether he could do it in a game," said Flint about Brand. "The kid has got ability. He is going to be a pretty good player for us, he just has to keep up the attitude."

Playing the aggressor from the start, UMass shook off the early misses as it went shot-for-shot with the All-Stars. At 16:31 in the first half, a hustling Kirkland shoveled a ball headed out of bounds to Crooks, who dropped a pass to Rhymer for the easy dunk to give UMan early 10-4 lead.

DePina, who had 15 points and six assists, and Crooks, who finished with 24 points and a team-high seven assists, then took over five minutes into the game and knocked down a combined 10 points in a span of a minute and a half for a 22-15 advantage.

"We run a lot of plays for that position, so we're going to get shots," said Flint in reference to the duo's offensive output. "The kid (Crooks) hasn't played basketball for two years so this was huge for him in terms of confidence. And he was looking forward to this more than anybody on the team. I thought he did a good job."

Kirkland benefited the most from the up-tempo style, leading UMass with 26 points on a 12-for-15 night. The captain closed out the first half with three consecutive lay-ups, as the Minutemen were ahead at the half, 57-48.

"We can play fast because we're smaller. If we don't play fast, then were in trouble because people are going to kill us inside," Flint said.

With only nine players available last night, Flint's crew came out in the second half a step slower, handing the All-Stars a window of opportunity. Led by a 34-point performance by Mack Tuck, the Golden State-based team hacked away at the lead with 16 points to UMass' 11.

After a 20-second timeout with 10:05 left, the Minutemen rallied back when DePina knocked down two jumpers and Close your eyes for a moment and the lead changed hands twice. Visit the concession stand and the game was over.

From the opening tip to the final buzzer, there was little time for the 3,115 strong at the Mullins Center to take a breath or a break in the Minutemen's 103-97 conquering of the California All-Stars. The rumor was that Massachusetts men's basketball coach Bruiser Flint was going to up the tempo, but those on hand figured he would ease into fifth gear.

Nope.

Last night's game was a complete makeover from what the Minutemen faithful have become accustomed to. A hard-nosed defense gave way to a transition offense that made a rare visit to Amherst. With it came the smiles, a scarce commodity amid last season's verbal warfare on the court.

They were actually having fun.

"You could see it in the guys. I think we're getting excited and getting the crowd excited and everybody as a team was getting excited," Kirkland said. "Everybody was just coming out and having fun."

At the machine's control board was St. John's transfer Shannon Crooks, who added the largest dose to the fast break formula, one that could only work with the current personnel of young, quick players. Crooks, who sat out last season after leaving the Red Storm in 1997, weaved in and out, looked only when needed and, if anything, dazzled a crowd that searched unsuccessfully for something to cheer about last season.

The sophomore tallied 24 points, five rebounds and a game-high seven assists in 32 minutes of play, playing the floor general for a gung-ho offense whose 103-point output was the most for the Minutemen since their 103-53 destruction of Duquesne in Pittsburgh four years ago. While his five turnovers might induce a share of shrieks from fans of basketball purity, Crooks wowed the Mullins Center with his ability to get the ball to the rim, contributing his fair share to the Minutemen's 72 points in the paint.

"He couldn't played basketball in two years, so this is huge for him," Flint said of Crooks. "He was looking forward to this more than anybody on the team, playing in the first game. I thought he did a good job."

Crooks joined a rejuvenated Jonathan DePina in the backcourt. A spot player last season, DePina's role has seemingly taken a giant step up to where the Boston native not only started, but played a game-high 34 minutes. The junior struggled immensely last season, averaging just under two points a game, but last night a new DePina was on display.

At the 16:06 mark of the first half, DePina drilled an 18-footer from the left wing, following it with a three-pointer 40 seconds later. It was just the beginning for DePina, who finished the night with 13 points, four rebounds and six assists.

"Jonathan played with a lot of confidence. He played the way we need him to play for us to be successful," Flint said. "He knocked down shots and he took shots. I'm happy for him."

While the Minutemen shot 58 percent from the field, the All-Stars showed that the new recipe might have a funny flavor to it. Scoring came almost at will for both squads. Just a night after falling in another up and down battle with the Syracuse Orangemen, 96-93, the All-Stars fell down by nine at the half, but battled back in the second, outscoring the Minutemen, 49-46 after intermission.

"If you look in the past, we're a defensive team. That's what we do. We play good defense. We help out and we rebound," Kirkland said. "We got to get back to that and keep doing what we've been doing, like trapping and making the guys turn the ball over."

The points came almost too easily

UM seniors set to take their final kicks at Totman Field

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

With the way that things have fallen into place heading into this weekend's Atlantic 10 tournament, the six seniors of the Massachusetts women's soccer team have a chance to go out with a storybook ending.

Dayton, Xavier and St. Bonaventure will all be looking to knock the host Minutewomen out of the tournament, which they host. However, UMass wants to claim the crown on its own turf, while also earning the automatic bid to the NCAA tournament in the process.

Regardless of the results, this will likely be the final time that Cindy Garceau, Emma Kurowski, Angie Napoli, Robin Smith, Tarah Tokarchik and Kate Webb suit up in front of the Totman Field faithful. The lone scenario in which UMass could play one additional game at home would be in a possible NCAA first-round matchup.

The Class of 2000 has made its mark on the UMass program in its four years in Amherst. Heading into this weekend they sport a 54-25-2 record as a class, including two trips to the NCAA tournament.

"It seems like it's been an awfully fast four years. I will certainly miss them when they leave," Massachusetts women's soccer coach Jim Rudy said. "They certainly had their ups and one glitch [last year], but they played hard and did what we asked them to do."

A two-way threat

Garceau has emerged as one of the feel-good stories of the season for the Minutewomen. After scoring only one goal and four points in her first three years, the Upton native already has six goals this season. Those six goals and 12 points currently rank her third on the team in both categories.

"Cindy is having a good year, which I'm glad to see, especially because it's her senior year. She deserves the success she is having because she's worked hard to get here," Rudy said. "It's great to see her beaming [with a smile] after she has scored a goal because she knows that she's done well."

Up until this season, Garceau was been known more for her defensive prowess than for her scoring ability. Always one of the team's primary jumpers, the senior has flourished this season on both ends of the field.

"I'm not a flashy player, so maybe that's why I can get overlooked. It seems like now I've been given more of an opportunity than in the beginning of last season," she said. "Last year I focused more on defense, but this year I have a little more freedom [offensively] at center-mid [field]."

Added Rudy, "She has established herself as a primary jumper on her own, and just done a nice job in there."

As she nears the end of her collegiate career, Garceau seems to be pleased with choosing the path that took her to UMass.

"It's been fun. I met a lot of great people, and I learned a lot from both coach and my teammates," she said.

Simply the best

It seems almost hard to believe that Kurowski will leave UMass as the all-time leading scorer in the history of the program, mainly because she has been hampered by injuries for the better parts of four years. Nevertheless, the Sutton native has battled through those minor setbacks to score 46 goals and add 30 assists for 122 career points.

"I'm really excited that I broke it [the record], especially considering all of the great players who were here before me and all of the teams that went to the Final Four," Kurowski said. "Just to know that I'm on a list with them is awesome."

Kurowski broke two records that were held by Rebecca Myers back on Sept. 24 against Connecticut. With two goals against the Huskies on that afternoon, she moved past Myers in both career goals and points.

Since then, the two-time All-Atlantic 10 selection and 1996 A-10 Rookie of the Year has continued to pace the UMass offense. So far this season, she has scored 30 points to lead the club, on 13 goals and four assists.

"She's a natural goal-scorer who has a full repertoire of finishing skills," Rudy said. "In a way, she's like former West German great Ger Mueller. I was fortunate enough to be coached by his former coach, Detmer Kramer, who said that outside the penalty area, Mueller was an average to poor player. But inside the penalty area, he's the best in the world."

"Although it doesn't exactly apply to Emma, there is a similarity... Emma is pretty damn good outside the box, too," added Rudy.

A rock between the pipes

Another Minutewoman who appears to be saving the best for last is Napoli. The UMass senior goalkeeper has posted a 6-2 record this season, including a 4-1 mark in the A-10.

The Longmeadow product has teamed up with sophomore Cori Stevens during the past two years to create a formidable one-two goal-keeping punch that has kept the opposition off-balance.

"I think that I've been playing pretty well. I've been solid and pretty consistent," said Napoli, whose 152 career saves place her fifth on the all-time list at UMass. "I try to go and get everything while I'm out there, and not second guess myself. If I make a mistake, then I've just got to let it go."

For her first two years, Napoli served as the backup to Danielle Dion. However, since emerging as a part-time starter last season, she has been a stabilizing last line of defense for the Minutewomen.

"Angie is more laid back [than Cori], but she is also more explosive. Her ability to get up to the bar is also better," Rudy said. "We're very pleased to have both of them. They have been great team players and are very supportive of each other."

Overall, Napoli is also pleased with her decision to come to UMass.

"I knew that UMass was a great soccer school, and that it had the major that I was interested in," she said. "I'm glad that I decided to come here. I met a lot of great people and was able to grow while I was here."

The captain of the UMass ship

Originally, Smith was not one of the members of the Class of 1999. However, Rudy and the rest of the Minutewomen couldn't be happier with her decision to transfer from Creighton University following her freshman year.

"When I was going to transfer, I was looking [at schools] where I could step up in the program, and UMass had just been to the Final Four a few years earlier," Smith said. "I was looking to play for a well-respected program that had the potential to do great things."

Unfortunately for the Naperville, Ill. resident, injuries have limited her action during her three years at UMass. Nevertheless, she has made a positive impact on the program, even in those instances when she was playing through pain.

"I remember one day she said to me 'Coach, I don't feel like I'm doing any good for the team because I'm only playing at 50-percent'. And I said to her 'are you kidding me? You playing at 50-percent is like most players at 90-percent, so shut up and get back on the field," quipped Rudy. "I have no doubt that she could have been one of the better players in the country if it weren't for the injuries."

The UMass captain missed all of last season with an ankle injury, and also missed parts of the pre-season this year with an injury to the same body part. Then, to make matters worse, she sprained her ankle in a game at Temple midway through the regular season, which forced her to miss a few games.

"My career has been somewhat stunted by injuries, but that probably would have happened anywhere that I went," she said." As far as soccer, I think that I could have done better if it wasn't for the injuries, but a spin-off from that was that I was able to seek out some other opportunities. I can't complain."

Smith has scored only one goal

Meningitis prevention is imminent

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts University Health Services will be vaccinating students against meningitis Monday, Nov. 8 through Friday, Nov. 12, Bernette Melby, the director of UHS, announced the clinics, which will cost $75 per vaccination.

"We have set up clinics that are totally voluntary for students," Bernette Melby, the director of University Health Services, said. "All next week, November 8-12 from 1-8 p.m. in room 302 at the University Health Services, vaccines will be available to students."

Melby said that they would expect checks, cash, Visa, Mastercard or Discover.

While this is not the first time that widespread vaccinations have been available to students, as in the case of flu, it is the first time that there has been a meningitis clinic. Two students have become ill with meningococcal disease, which causes Meningitis.

Meningitis is an inflammation of the linings of the brain and spinal cord. It can be caused by either bacterium or viruses. Common symptoms include a stiff neck, headaches, high temperatures, having a very hard time waking up, confusion and exhaustion.

It can be caused when saliva is shared between individuals. Students that use the same toothbrush, kiss, smoke the same cigarette, or do anything else that would in any way constitute shared saliva run a higher risk of getting sick.

But 10-15 percent of humans also have the organism necessary to cause meningitis already in their throat. Most people will develop an immunity over time, but the infection can be spread to others through close contact.

In both September and late October, students have come down with bacterial meningitis. Although the sick individual from the most recent case has been treated and released, UHS was forced to treat both 65 people that were at a fraternity party with the individual and another 317 from Patterson Dorm in the Southwest Residential Area.

Students were all given, free, 500 milligrams of Ciprofloxin, the most common preventative anti-biotic for meningitis. There are other medicines available in the case of allergies.

Melby said that the vaccination would be available all year long, but that, in the next couple of days, the schedule would be changed to make things easier on students.

"Yes, this is more work for us, but what we're doing is making this more convenient for the student," Melby said. "Some of our staffs have had to shift their schedules, but that is all about making the vaccination convenient."

According to Melby, students would need to set up an appointment if they wanted to be vaccinated after Nov. 12.

It should, however, be noted that the vaccination cannot prevent all forms of meningitis. It can prevent four different serogroups of the miningococcal bacteria, but is not effective against serogroup B, the cause of one-third of all national meningitis cases.

A.J. Lardner, the UHS Public Health Nurse, warned that even if a student were vaccinated, they should still receive anti-biotic treatment. Students would receive, as the students in both Patterson and the fraternity party had, Ciprofloxin.

Melby said that the decision to open

Governors discuss parking on grassy knoll

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Potential solutions to the ongoing parking problem near the Orchard Hill and Central Residence Areas were discussed yesterday by student government representatives and concerned students.

Representatives from both living areas on campus gathered in the Baker classroom in order to discuss a satisfactory temporary solution to the lack of adequate parking on campus. Students went over a proposal suggested by Orchard Hill Area Governor Jefferson Smith that was formulated with help from Parking Services head Michael Brennan.

This proposal was created in response to the overflow of students that now lack parking in the Orchard Hill and Central areas. Smith explained that since, "there is no pennanent place for students to park, students made their own parking lot."

The grassy area, which is now a student-made parking lot, is located adjacent to the Grayson Residence Hall in the Orchard Hill Living Area and typically holds about 90-100 cars. Since this grass lot is dangerous in the winter months due to snow, mud, and inclimate weather, suggestions have been made to turn this into an official lot. This lot would be temporary for the school year, and will be made of gravel. "No trees would be cut down," Smith explained in regards to the proposal.

Jeff Perlman the treasurer of Orchard Hill Area government explained that this lot is exactly like any other lot on campus. If students park outside of the designated lines, they will be ticketed and towed.

In addition, it is also proposed that new spaces, which are currently metered parking spaces, be placed adjacent to the New Africa House, located in the Central living area. Gorman senator Jennifer Bishop spoke in support of the new spaces commenting that currently, "many of the metered spots are students that are currently having parking problems."

The final part of the policy deals with a 24 hour a day, five days a week, monitoring of the Purple Lots near the residential areas.

Long-term goals for the next school year within this program are for lot specific Parking Permits, ensuring that no student is without a parking spot, and that the gravel parking lot is removed. Central-At-Large Senator, Ken Campbell suggested, in order to get an adequate idea of how many parking spaces exist, "next year we do not take the gravel lot into consideration."

Information was also passed out dispelling current misconceptions about the parking situation. Smith explained that no decision has been reached as to what to do about the parking situation, and no changes will be made without the input of area students. He also explained that if the proposed lot is taken into effect, no changes would be permanent.

Smith explained that the parking problem was not due to overselling of spaces in the Purple lot but instead due to the large amount of students with Purple stickers currently living in

Gorman discusses racial graffiti

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

The residents of Gorman Hall spoke last night on the racial and sexist graffiti that covered the walls of their home in early Sept. They addressed the small audience in an attempt to express that racism does exist and that it shouldn't be tolerated.

The panel of five Gorman residents each told their story and discussed how the incident had personally affected them. They shared with the audience where their feelings were coming from in relation to their backgrounds. Each panelist shared the same sentiment: that they never believed they would be faced with such racism at the University and especially not in their home.

April Dottin was at a loss for words when she came home to find racial slurs and sexist comments covering some doors and walls. The outrage spread throughout the dorm, as residents organized a forum in response to the incident that affected three floors.

"I felt totally weak. It shattered my home and my spirituality for the first time," Jason Sherman said. "I'm deeply offended someone would violate my home. They spit on people I consider my friends."

Stephen Brown, also a resident of Gorman said that hate only creates more hate. He said the incident made him more uncomfortable than he has ever felt before. The experience forced him to the realization that the world is far from perfect and that racism is everywhere.

Together the panel agreed that the incident created an atmosphere in the building where fear, suspicion, and anger existed. Darren Smith, Gorman House Council president said, "This event pushed me to run for president. My goal is to ensure that the frustration, suspicion and fear stops. Gorman is my home away from home and there's no way I'm going to live somewhere that I feel threatened."

Others on the panel spoke on how they felt the incident was related to the affirmative action issue at the University. "I personally feel this incident comes from the cut in affirmative action," Vyalinah Shakir-Burgess said. "The cut sends out an underlying message that diversity is not appreciated on campus."

Shakir-Burgess is the president of the group, "Not in Our Building," formed as a reaction to the graffiti. The group plans to among other things create a contract, explaining what the multi-cultural dorm is, that residents would have to sign in order in order to live in Gorman.

The panel felt that the most important thing at this point is to make people aware that racism occurs and that it happens to everyone. "As a community they [the Gorman residents] came together to fight and said, 'We will not tolerate this in our home,'" Zaticha Fuentes, Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) campus coordinator said. She asked the audience to come together as well and intervene when they saw racism.

"Think carefully and get involved. Be proud of who you are," Juliet Okafor, a resident of Gorman and Governor of Central Area government said. She said it was not about enemies or one race against another. No one should ever have to feel uncomfortable. "Don't target the opposite race, because we are all part of the human race and we need to stand united," Okafor said.

The panel discussion was the last event of Hate Crimes Awareness Week at the University of Massachusetts.

Senate discusses Division 1-A change

Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Faculty representatives at yesterday's Faculty Senate meeting discussed the possibility that somedas in the future, the University of Massachusetts football team may move to Division 1-A, the highest echelon of collegiate athletics.

Although there has been no proposed move as of yet, a consultant was hired by the University in order to obtain more information about the possibility. According to Chancellor David K. Scott, the consultant was hired to make an assessment as to whether or not a move to Division 1-A would be best for the University.

"If UMass does this, it must be part of a bigger package," Scott said. "Students must soar academically, and athletically."

Patricia Vittum, Co-Chair of the Athletic Council, clarified the ranking of the University in the area of sports by explaining that the school is ranked 51st in the country and 3rd in Division 1-A. She went on to say that in addition the athletes had "a very, strong showing on the academic side."

In addition, Scott said the University has been analyzing the issue for over five years and will "leave no stone unturned" for information. He explained that the University must be ready with all of the information in order to make an educated decision, and that it must be best for the entire school.

"It will be a decision on the whole future and nature of our sports program," Scott said.

In addition, the Faculty Senate also discussed the issue of funding within the Intercampus Marine School. The school, which is to be a joint effort between the four schools in the UMass system, is still in the early stages of implementation. Some senators expressed concern for the financial burden that may be placed upon UMass-Amherst as a result of the new school. Interim Secretary Joseph Larson suggested that the funding "might be shared equally with the campuses involved."

Scott added another possibility by explaining that funds in the president's office, which are not being distributed, could also be used to fund the project. He explained that it would simply be a "reallocation of resources."

Student Trustee Seth Avakian represented the Student Government Association at the meeting and spoke about issues that concerned the student body as a whole. Avakian advocated the Course and Teacher Evaluation guide for students. He explained that it has been difficult to obtain faculty participation in the evaluation.

Area website holds "talent show"

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

What would you do if your life were being broadcast via the World Wide Web?

When Truman Burbank in the "Truman Show" realized his life was a stage and everyone around him were actors, he did the unpredictable. Now, MassLive, a web site devoted primarily to information on Western Massachusetts, has announced a most unpredictable contest to search for America's most talented students.

MassLive is hosting an "off-campus cam talent search" in what a press release said, "may be an Internet first."

One off-campus household will have the chance to have their lives broadcast over the World Wide Web 24-hours a day, seven days a week.

Students interested in having their house wired with the latest Internet technology and sharing their daily comings and goings with the entire world must fill out a registration form at www.masslive.com/offcampuscam and submit interesting photos of themselves captured on MassLive's existing web cam located at Antonio's Pizza in downtown Amherst.

Lou Cove, MassLive senior producer, said in a press release that they are giving students a chance to become famous while pushing for technological advances in the Internet.

"Plenty of folks have web cams, but I've never heard of a public talent search like this one," Cove said. "We're giving students a chance to become stars on the Web and pushing the Internet envelope in the process... it's an exciting event."

To enter the contest, students must gather all their roommates in front of Antonio's PizzaCam. Standing in some kind of pose, students are suggested to stay in one place for at least a minute so that the camera can register what they're doing.

The next step in the entry process, according to MassLive, is for participants to uncover their photos on the Campus Cam archives and to save the image on the computer.

However, according to the press release, "to qualify for the Off-Campus Cam talent search you must sign a release form, have your landlord sign one, and be willing to have signs, video and computer equipment in your apartment for a term to be defined by us prior to launch-

He went on to explain that the guide is essential for students to learn more about the classes that they are interested in taking. Currently, the evaluation is a compilation of student responses to individual classes. In order to make the guide more in-depth, the SGA hopes to provide students with information such as reading lists and syllabi for each prospective class. Avakin said that making these changes would benefit both students and professors at the university, and "better prepare students that really want to be taking the class."

Also during the meeting, the Faculty Senate approved nine new classes that cover five departments on campus. The classes ranged from the areas of Italian to psychology and were recommended to the Senate by the Academic Matters Council.

CIA continues to aid women's oppression

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

Efforts made 20 years ago to halt the spread of Communism into the Middle East are still being felt today in Afghanistan as women there have been subjected to gender apartheid since the Sept. 27, 1996 takeover by extremist militia group, Taliban.

According to Feminist Majority Foundation President Eleanor Smeal, who gave a talk yesterday at the Everywoman's Center entitled "Gender Apartheid in Afghanistan and what you can do to stop it," women and girls have been forced to quit their jobs, completely cover themselves from head to toe with only a mesh cutout to see, and are currently unable to seek health care under the Taliban rule.

"They treat women as if they are in the Dark Ages," said Smeal. "The women kept thinking that somebody would rescue them."

Smeal feels the U.S. is partly responsible because the Central Intelligence Agency assisted in training the religious fascists, the Mujideen, of which the Taliban is one of seven groups to emerge.

In the midst of the Cold War between Russian and the U.S. in 1979, the CIA provided weapons and money to the Mujideen, which stands for "Soldiers of God," so they could train in Pakistan after the Soviet Union invaded a Communist-dominated Afghani government.

In 1989, the Soviet Union pulled out of Afghanistan, leaving the seven strong Mujideen groups to battle in a civil war for which was the strongest. The Taliban came out on top and followed through with a full military takeover of the Afghani capital city of Kabul in 1996, and began to lay new rules which conflict with universal human rights.

Their world today is much different than it was three years ago, according to Smeal. Today, the windows on their houses must be painted so no one can look in. Practically under house arrest, an Afghani woman may not leave her home unless a male within her family escorts her. If she leaves alone or with someone outside of her family, she risks being labeled an adulteress, and will most likely be stoned, beaten, or whipped to death by the Taliban militia, which man the streets with medieval weapons. They are also not allowed to bathe in the city's only site for hot water.

Afghani women cannot wear white socks because they are considered too Western, and are banned from wearing shoes that make noise. Young children, who are also subjected to such rules, wear nail polish on their fingernails and toes in a showing of defiance. If they are caught, their fingers or toes will be cut off. Children cannot play with musical instruments or toys and as a result, 90 percent suffer from acute anxiety. In a recent medical study, over 90 percent of the women are clinically depressed and others have even gone so far as to commit suicide with a slow-acting poison.

According the Feminist Majority, more than three million Afghani, the largest number of refugees in the world, have been escaping to bordering Iran and Pakistan. The population of Afghanistan had once stood at 17 million but Smeal estimates that about five million have fled, three million are trapped in encampments while tens of thousands more have perished.

Feminist Majority has attracted the attention of President Clinton and is coordinating an Afghan Women's Scholarship Program in which the Afghani women come to the U.S. and study with the assistance of American colleges and universities.

"The perpetual myth is that Afghan women wouldn't go away to school if they could, but they sure as hell would if they could," said Smeal.

McCain set to slash federal budget proposal

By Anne-Marie O'Connor
Los Angeles Times

Parting with his Republican colleagues in Congress, presidential candidate John McCain rejected the GOP's proposal for a 1 percent cut in the federal budget and offered his own plan Thursday to slash $13 billion of budget items, ranging from aircraft carriers to West Coast conservation programs.

Speaking in New Hampshire yesterday, McCain criticized the GOP's across-the-board cut as random and ineffective and said his proposal would preserve worthy programs. Like the congressional plan, which was vetoed Wednesday by President Clinton, McCain said his cuts would protect funding for Social Security and Medicare and provide enough money for tax cuts and debt reduction.

"We should have the courage to eliminate the pork-barrelling and wasteful spending and not reduce vital programs such as Meals-on-Wheels," McCain said in a telephone interview from New Hampshire. Taking another jab at the Republicans in Congress, the senator from Arizona added: "I know that (pork) has increased since the Republicans took over Congress" in 1994.

The elimination of wasteful government spending is a cornerstone of McCain's presidential campaign. McCain has attacked special interest groups for "corrupting" Washington policymakers with campaign contributions and by lobbying for self-serving policies.

The issue has caught fire among voters in the crucial early primary state of New Hampshire, where McCain has dramatically eroded the once-hefty lead enjoyed by the Republican frontrunner, Texas Gov. George W. Bush.

UM employees strike gold

Donations help shelters and charities

Andrea M. Peers

By donating a portion of their paychecks each week, University of Massachusetts employees have given over $300,000 to help community members in need.

Last May, the UMass branch of the "Caring and Sharing" program was awarded the top donor award by State Secretary of Administration and Finance, Andrew S. Natsios, for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts Employees Charitable Campaign (COMECC). The funds received in the campaign totaled $318,278, all of which were used to help keep communities and people safe. The Group this year will look to increase that number by seven percent, to about $340,000.

Last month marked the kickoff of the annual program "Caring and Sharing" began roughly in 1886, with the purpose of making a better way of life for the people in the Hampshire County communities. The annual campaign is headed by the Leader's Circle, an organization that finds donors who give $500 dollars or more to participate in the program. University employees are asked to donate $10 or more of their weekly paycheck to the fund in order to raise money for charitable groups. On Oct. 14, the Leader's Circle Campaign joined with the COMECC to begin funding the University branch.

"The goal of the program is to get state employees to donate money, in order to help out their neighbors and their local community," said Emily Desantis, publicity director for "Caring and Sharing."

Each employee receives a pledge form and pledge card. They can choose to give their donation to one of thousands of charitable organizations. All the money donated in the campaign is divided up between these organizations, according to the donor's wish. These organizations are local, and include the Salvation Army in Northampton, the Hamp-shire Community Action Commission and the Environmental League of Massachusetts.

Donor money directed toward the Salvation Army will go towards an annual children's Christmas party, where gifts and food will be given to the needy. Money pledged also helps to sponsor 20 children every year, so that they can attend Camp Wonderland in Sharon. The Salvation Army is also expected to deliver gifts to veteran's hospitals and nursing homes across the Hampshire County.

The Hampshire Community Action Commission collects money in order to give financial support to people who need money for housing, rent, utilities, fuel, health and medical support. Last year, the program received over 5,000 calls from area residents needing support. COMECC was able to support these callers. Aiding in the program to help answer calls was volunteer Marjorie Karlson, a retired UMass librarian.

"Each year, we help thousands of people from our community and that's very rewarding," said Karlson. "HCAC's First Call for Help Program is here whenever you need it."

Another group that has gained recognition through the COMECC campaign is the Environmental League of Massachusetts. Money donated to this cause will help fight and protect wildlife habitats, air and water pollution, state parks and the preservation of open spaces for wildlife safety.

I'm all stressed out

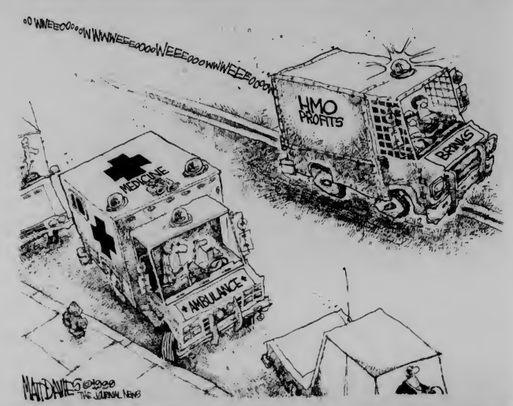
Does anyone else feel stressed out? Yeah, I thought so. Show me a college student who is not stressed out and I will show you a) a drunk college student b) a stoned college student c) a senior with a 4.0 who has already passed all his finals and has a fabulous job lined up or d) someone who just doesn't care and is going to drop out anyway. Since most of us are not drunk or stoned all of the time (notice I said most, not all), and we do not have fabulous jobs lined up or perfect GPA's or plans of dropping out, I would say that almost every student at UMass qualifies as being stressed out.

Laura Siciliano

Stress is defined by Webster's Dictionary as "A state in which a strong demand is made on the nervous system". While this is the technically correct definition, as someone who is constantly stressed, I feel as though I am qualified to say that stress is so much more than that. Stress is having a test, a paper, a deadline or anything that has to happen by a certain time. Relationships, friendships, phone calls and visits with parents define stress. Stress is: finding a major and sticking with it, Math 127, wondering if you are in the right major, preregistration, add/drop and finding a job.

Stress elicits feelings of worry, anxiety, depression, anger, and sadness. Stress is what we feel before an exam and how we feel afterward when we do not get the grade we wanted. When we feel totally burnt out and as if we have no energy left to devote to anything, then we are experiencing stress.

A major cause of stress is that we have too many things on our plates. While we are here for the education, we are also here for the social aspects of college and the extracurricular activities that make us well-rounded people. However, sometimes we can be a little too round. If we dip our energy into too many things, we can spread ourselves very thin, making ourselves vulnerable to the attacks of stress. Sometimes there are not just enough hours in the day to do all that we want to do, and no matter how hard we try, we cannot add any hours to the calendar.



The question becomes, "what can we do about stress?" We know that it's not going to go away. Stress is an inherent aspect of human nature. Our bodies have specific stress mechanisms designed to deal with situations that we encounter. For example, to deal with the stress of thirst, our mouths salivate. However, most of the time, we are not biologically programmed to deal with the everyday stresses that we encounter. Personally, I'm a worrier. My stress comes to me not in panic attacks or by pulling all-nighters, but instead it is brought about by constant, nagging feelings that something went wrong, is wrong or will go wrong. This is a not a stress that biology can relieve.

Instead I have to find some physical, tangible ways to deal with my worries. I have become quite good at some of the methods. One of my personal favorites is sleep. Going to bed always seems to alleviate my worries, unless I dream or have nightmares about them. Another (better) method is venting. Often, people hold their worries or stresses inside, not coping with them simply because they think that if they ignore the stress, it will disappear. However, quite the opposite effect occurs as a result of ignoring stress. Usually, it builds up and expands over time as it is ignored, coming to a final point where we just snap. If you have ever seen the remake of Father of the Bride, Steve Martin demonstrates beautifully what happens when stress is ignored. Dealing with the insane preparations for his daughter's wedding, Martin's character eventually goes off the deep end over a rather small situation and ends up stealing hotdog buns from a grocery store. While most of us will not react that erratically to compounded stress, we can behave in rather unusual and unhealthy ways if we let our stress simmer over time.

Venting is a good way to deal with stress because it is a release. Finding a friend and simply letting out what you are stressed about almost always results in you feeling as if a burden has been lifted from your shoulders. Sometimes, someone will have experienced the same feelings that you are experiencing, so their shared knowledge can help you to find a way to feel better.

With all of the stresses of college life, we need to make sure that we do not get burdened down with responsibilities, commitments and expectations thereby forgetting ourselves. The best way to relieve stress is often to find some time alone. If we are constantly going, never taking any time to rest, then our bodies and minds do not have any time to unwind. With all of the information that we are bombarded with daily, our brains need to zone out every once in a while. The best thing to do to let your brain rest is to watch television. The boob tube has a purpose after all. Watching a brainless movie, or some cartoons, or MTV is the perfect way to let your mind relax. So, enjoy these years. Study hard (but not too hard), get your sleep, and remember that every once in a while, we all need a break.

Letters to the Editor

Bill Bradley
for president

To the editor:

As most of you are already aware, next year is an important election year with ramifications on a national scale. It is time once again to select our next president. Disillusionment with our political system and apathy aside, I would like to propose a candidate that I believe many students will find attractive for his ideals and his integrity.

Bill Bradley, a hall-of-fame former basketball player, and ex-senator from New Jersey, has an excellent record on many issues, and his proposals for the future of our country are even more promising. As a liberal Democrat, Bradley represents the best hopes for a new, cleaner brand of politics with an equitable and progressive social agenda. Among Mr. Bradley's top campaign initiatives are campaign finance reform and the removal of special interest money from government; expanded health care for the ranks of millions of uninsured, particularly poverty stricken families and children; a clean environment; equality of treatment for all people regardless of race, gender or sexual orientation; and accessible, quality education for all who seek it.

I urge you to actively engage yourself in this most important of civic obligations. The Bradley campaign has entered a crucial stage, with the New Hampshire primary a mere three months away. We need your help as bright, spirited and dedicated individuals, to bring Mr. Bradley's message to New Hampshire voters. This weekend, November 6 and 7, hundreds of students from across the northeast will gather together to rally, canvass and celebrate this candidate.

My own faith in Mr. Bradley and his vision for our future has compelled me to work toward his nomination, and hopefully, his eventual election. If you would like to do the same, please contact the Concord, NH headquarters at 603-224-4222, or reach Emily Callahan on campus at 546-4104 or emcallah@student.umass.edu. This is an opportunity to make a difference – for yourself, for your school, and for the betterment of our country.

Time's passing me by Looking at my watch tI really don't have a watch, but imagine it), I see that today's date is November 5th. NOVEMBER 5th? Did I miss something? The last time I checked my watch I didn't have, it was Oct. 5th.

Suddenly, like a strange revelation one would only find in the Twilight Zone, I realized that a month of my life strangely vanished into thin air. As I looked around, I was certain that while time vanished, most other things did not. I had stacks of footage shot for my student film in random piles all over the place. I had a score of papers and tests that I must have completed, although I honestly wish they had vanished along with the time. Somewhere in this mental mushroom flashes of long hours in small rooms came and went. There was a series where a New York team won again for the umpteenth time. Other than that, the month of October was a hazy blur of orange and gold trees, which blanketed the pioneer valley.

Boo Downs

My first reaction was one of bewilderment. Why did this happen? Was this somebody's twisted idea of a joke? The leaves that were once so colorful are now dead, long since trampled on the frosty ground. I barely remember the sound of my parents' voices, as I cannot fathom the last time I spoke with them. As these revelations continued to smack me around, the final blow brought me to my knees: Halloween had come and gone. What was I doing that weekend? Besides being sick and in bed, and making my first movie preview, I was doing little else.

So I missed Halloween. That night felt no different than any other night. This revelation scared me, as somebody stole the month of October away from me. A time from the famous Charlie Brown Halloween Special came to mind.

"Halloween is gone and I missed it... You blockhead! You owe me restitution!"

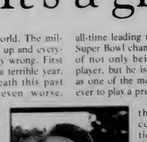
That somebody certainly owes me restitution. I've never missed a Halloween before, and I fear old age has finally caught up with me. Now you may have had a great time for Halloween, and you are probably saving to yourself, "Why didn't you just go out and do something?" You know, I would have, if I had known that Halloween was actually approaching. But, as I mentioned before, somebody stole the month of October right out from under my nose. What will be my course of action?

Simple. I will bribe Johnny Cochran, and sue somebody for all they are worth. After all, I have suffered severe mental and psychological trauma due to the loss of October.

My case would start by mentioning elements from my childhood. As a kid, I knew that Halloween was coming a month beforehand. It would be the end of September and I'd be scheming the best ways to scare people. By the first weekend of October, I'd not only know what I was going to dress up as, but I would also have a detailed floor plan of the haunted house that I would use to scare my little sister and her friends into submission. My parents would bring out large boxes of decorations, adding new weapons to my scare arsenal. It was the great joy of the fall season to make my custom haunted house.

I had a different plan each year, as I would find new ways of making scary things come out of nowhere. As the years progressed, pulleys, chains and wheels added spice to my wonderful contraptions. Skeletons would rise out from the ground and dance for the kids. Sharp turns brought the kids into glowing ghosts. Ah, it was a wonderful time. When the big night came, I'd be out with all the kids. Never mind that: my friend, who happened also to be a "Shaun", would go out and really scare people. It would not be because we were scary people, but the concept of two, six-feet and four-inch men running around the neighborhood was not really pleasant to the locals.

Then, I went to college, and things began to change. Somebody was giving me the slip because time was moving week to week instead of day to day. Weekends were a blur, and I found myself looking forward to getting a weekend into my schedule. However, nothing in this time lapse could compare to the entire month disappearing, including one of my favorite holidays. I was in a daze, unable to think, as I felt my life spinning out of control. In reaction, I restarted my drinking habit. With all that lolt in my system, I knew I needed help, and fast. So, I stand before you, pleading for help so that my suffering may be abated.



I sat back, confident that my heartfelt tale would touch the hearts of you, the readers. There was nothing the opposition could do to repudiate my claims. Then he came. Approaching me was a man who happened to look exactly like me, but carried himself as if he knew what I needed to know. He introduced himself as "Boo," and he came right up to me. He looked at me, and simply said, "You are not alone."

It is written in the Book of Boo that, "Time is everywhere and nowhere, never and forever." Children stare at wonder as the clock ticks, each second a whole eternity. Adults lose time by using it as a tool, a weapon, a threat. Everything must have a deadline, must be done now or be done soon. November 5th is just a date that people assign for tests, presentation, work, etc. November 5th is no longer a Friday that is between Thursday, November 4th, and Saturday, November 6th.

It's a great loss

It's a very scary world. The millennium is coming up and everything is completely wrong. First of all, 1999 ...as been a terrible year, including a major death this past week to make it even worse. Although I've always heard that "deaths happen in threes," I never really believed it until this past year. Being a huge sports fan, my world has been thrown completely off course in the past seven months with the loss of Joe DiMaggio, Will Chamberlain and Walter Payton.

Ryan Benharris

On March 8, 1999, Joe DiMaggio died of cancer. The man who had a lifetime batting average of .325, and hit in 56 consecutive games, left the world after leaving a mark on generations of people. His long struggle with his illness had so many people, myself included, at the edge of our seats, hoping that we wouldn't come home to the terrible news. However, on March 8, 1999, I heard the song "Mrs. Robinson" about ten times in under an hour. I think that was the radio's way of immortalizing the hero.

On Oct. 12, 1999, Will Chamberlain died of a heart attack. The only person to ever score 100 points in a single game in the NBA, and one of the top ten scorers of all time, left the world much too early, and will be remembered as a basketball legend, not just a player.

On Nov. 1, 1999, Walter Paston died of a strange liver disease. The all-time leading rusher, and one time Super Bowl champion leaves a legacy of not only being a great football player, but he is always talked about as one of the most wonderful people ever to play a professional sport.

What do these three men have in common? The question should be: what don't these three men have in common? I think the most important element to bring up is the fact that all three had a legitimate claim to being the greatest player ever to participate in their respective sports. Each one is remembered as being a person who defined the way an athlete should present himself on and off the playing field, and each one of them is no longer around to spread their wisdom to young athletes.

The way that these people impacted this country is astounding. DiMaggio is remembered most in New York, where along with Babe Ruth and Mickey Mantle, he is a Big Apple icon. Chamberlain's name is synonymous with "basketball." Even though we live in an era that is dominated by the now retired Michael Jordan, Chamberlain is certainly one of the early pioneers of the sport. In fact, when Jordan was asked who he thinks the top players in history are, he never neglects to mention Wilt the Stilt.

To leave Paston off of a list of sports legends would be a crime. He is the type of athlete that everyone strives to be. He was an inspiration to everyone, and even today's top running back such as Barry Sanders (who is currently "retired") and Emmitt Smith, who both have a chance to break Payton's record, say that they grew up dreaming of being like Payton. I don't know about you, but if I were an inspirational force behind Barry Sanders and Emmitt Smith, I'd consider that an accomplishment.

Two athletes died this year in the prime of their lives. This summer, pro-wrestler Owen Hart died from a fall into the ring. Everyone knows that last week, pro-golfer Payne Stewart died in a horrible plane crash. Both of these men unexpectedly left the world much too young.

I know I'm being quite a bit morbid, but this stuff really bothers me. As a life-long sports fan, I am devastated by the loss of these three tremendous athletes. Besides being devastated, it is a personal loss that makes everyone suffer.

The year still has two months left. The year 2000 is creeping up, and it's a shame that so many of these people will not be able to enter the new millennium with us.

I know that as I get older, I will remember the things that Joe DiMaggio, Wilt Chamberlain and Walter Paston have stood for. Their devotion to their work, and the things that they have left behind will not only be remembered, but they will be treasured as well. I guess I'm using this column as my tribute to three men that have shaped the world of sports. I still think it's eerie that they all died at around the same time.

MotherSON dazzles, enlightens crowd

By Jeanie Gorlovsky
Collegian Staff

For many GLBT (gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgendered) people, the process of "coming out of the closet" is full of fear and self-doubt. Many people, even those who are out to their friends and coworkers, wait a long time before finally coming out to their families, afraid of being rejected or losing their parent's affection. The process of coming out to one's family is chronicled beautifully in the one-man show MotherSON, was shown on Friday, Oct. 29th in Bowker Auditorium. The play is performed and written by Jeffrey Solomon. It is loosely autobiographical and it deals with his relationship with his mother, who passed away several years ago.

In the beginning of the play, Brad Levy, a man in his 20's, is living in California and trying to come out to his mother, Mindy Levy, back home in Long Island. Mindy is the stereotypical Jewish mother; she calls Brad several times a day on the phone and she tries to meddle in her son's love life by setting him up on dates with women, unaware that Brad is struggling with his sexuality. After Brad finally comes out to his mother, both he and Mindy go through a process of understanding each other and reinventing their relationship, a process which Solomon portrays in a very authentic and touching way on stage. MotherSON has a lot of emotional, heart-stirring moments to which many in the audience could relate. For example, in one scene, Mindy reminisces about an effeminate hairdresser she laughed at when she was a girl. Mindy then explains to Brad that her mother later taught her that Jewish people should not make fun of other minorities because they know the pain of bigotry and discrimination themselves. However, Solomon's play also has a lot of hilarious scenes. For example, Mindy is happy when she meets her son's new boyfriend because even though he is a man, he is also a doctor, since it is a popular joke that many Jewish parents want their children to marry doctors or lawyers. Another wonderful scene is when Mindy visits her first gay bar and points out the nicely-dressed "good boys" there to Brad. Overall, throughout the performance of MotherSON, many people in the audience alternated tears with laughter.

After the show was over, about thirty people in the audience stayed for a question-and-answer session with Solomon. All the people seemed to have greatly enjoyed the play. Many in the audience, both GLBT people and some PFLAG (Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays) parents, told Solomon that they could really relate to Mindy and Brad's relationship and that they had gone through similar life experiences. Solomon explained that he performs MotherSON at colleges, high schools, places of worship, and special events around the country. Solomon explained that he wrote the play after his mother's death, and that it allows him to feel closer to her. He said that he feels a great sense of accomplishment when GLBT people tell him that his play has inspired them to have conversations with their parents about their lives.

MotherSON was sponsored by several organizations, including the Stonewall Center, a GLBT resource center at UMass. The performance was a benefit for Donnie Roberts, the Assistant Director of the center, who had a disasterous fire in his apartment on Oct. 15 in which he lost many of his possessions.

Slept smiling the other day.
Slept smiling, awake and phasing out class, which is not my major so why care anyway? In meditation, in adoration of the shoulders, which distracted me from note-taking.
Those shoulders, those farming bare shoveling sweating grunting flexing dreams where a long courting pays off with this nice man, a mortgage, a pop-and-pop store in Maine's sparse wilderness, but not too far from Portland. We vend organic zucchini to the locals and register for domestic partnership, living the life of farmers writers lovers fathers. Adopt and raise indomitable daughters on a particularly boisterous crop of string beans.
Harvest sons like carrots; boys grow above and below ground.
The farmer and I in the compost heap,aerating rich dark humus with our pitchforks, bare shoulders distracting me from the concoction of eggshells rotted orange peelings earthworms manure brunched cantaloupe and the ghosts of Christmas trees past, are singing a fine Yankee worksong, and soon a stonewall will divide my dreams into cabbage and sheep and I will awake.

Gays imprisoned in Uganda

By Lawrence Mortensen
Collegian Correspondent

In late September, Ugandan President Yoweri K. Museveni ordered his country's law enforcement agencies to arrest all homosexuals in Uganda and charge them with what he classifies as "abominable acts." Uganda, a small, landlocked country in central Africa, has been regarded by many as one of the greatest budding nations on the entire continent. United States Secretary of State Madeline Albright even called Uganda "Africa's beacon of hope." Although the country is catching up with the rest of the world economically, it is socially stuck in the Stone Age. Although homosexual acts are illegal under Ugandan law, this charge by President Museveni is nothing less than the severe persecution of an already oppressed minority.

While most countries in the West seem to be attempting to integrate and protect their gay citizens, President Museveni chooses not to deal with the religious and social conflicts caused by the presence of gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered people in his country. Instead, he chooses to completely remove them from society. Homosexual practices are against the law in Uganda, as they are in many states of the U.S. This is somehow supposed to explain Museveni's stand. However, rules, regulations, and practices, everywhere in the world, should be subject to continuous scrutiny and amendment as free thinking citizens discover the laws' inappropriateness.

One can't help but wonder what President Museveni will do if his order is actually carried out. Where will all of the imprisoned gay citizens of Uganda go once they are arrested and convicted? Perhaps they will fill the prisons that were built to detain those who are involved in actual corruption and criminal acts. The government of Uganda will see many of its prominent and upstanding citizens jailed simply because of what they do behind closed doors. The president may be surprised to see people from the universities, from the world of arts, from the business community and from the parliament being thrown behind bars without giving a second thought to their contributions to society. What will he do if he discovers that one of them is his brother, or perhaps his own child?

What will happen when the Ugandan prisons become overcrowded? Maybe the government will decide that the nation's gay citizens need to be permanently eliminated from their society in order to free up space in the country's prisons. Though the current situation in Uganda cannot compare to the severity of the Holocaust, or of contemporary incidents of genocide in Cambodia and Yugoslavia, they all have one thing in common: the Ugandan law, this charge by President Museveni is nothing less than the severe persecution of an already oppressed minority.

GLBT Rally at Amherst

By Jeanie Gorlovsky
Collegian Staff

This Monday, on the same day that Hate Crimes Awareness Week at UMass began, students at neighboring Amherst College held an anti-hate-crime rally on their campus. This rally was planned by the Queer Straight Alliance (QSA) in response to several incidents of homophobia that had occurred on the campus during the previous week.

About 200 people, including students from the five colleges, members of the Amherst area GLBT (gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgendered) community and staff members of Amherst College, were present at the rally. People brought along candles, posters and pride flags. There was a microphone set up for anyone who wanted to speak out against homophobia, and several people expressed their hurt and anger over the events. "Some of us had planned to speak beforehand and did so. It was also open mike, so people really got to speak their minds," commented Mara Green, the co-chair of the QSA.

The QSA is following up the rally with anti-homophobia education for the students and staff of Amherst College. There are large quantities of educational flyers hanging up around the residence halls, including one with gay facts and another on ways to be a straight ally. "A flyer called the 'Heterosexual Quiz' asks stuff like, 'When did you know you were straight?' – basically all the basic questions queer people have to deal with, but inverted," explained Green. Table tents have been put on the tables in the dining hall with an explanation of why the rally took place. Also, the QSA provided a list of GLBT resources in the Amherst area to all the Resident Counselors on campus to post in their dorms.

According to Green, the rally was prompted by two specific acts of homophobia. On Oct. 23rd, unknown parties tore down several gay pride flags that were hanging up in front of the campus center in celebration of National Coming Out Day, which took place on Oct. 11th. Charges of vandalism and a possible hate crime were filed with the campus police after this event. Also, a violent physical threat was made to a bisexual student at the college through the Daily Jolt (www.dailyjolt.com), an unofficial website for the college. The campus police investigated the threat, and the investigation proceedings are now taking place with the disciplinary section of the administration. The administration also says that it will try to set up a task force to address the homophobia at Amherst College.

Felony murder verdict for Shepard attacker

By Julie Cart
Associated Press

DENVER – A high school dropout who blamed drugs, alcohol and an unwanted sexual advance for his crime was convicted Wednesday in Laramie, Wyoming, of felony murder in the beating death of gay student Matthew Shepard.

The jury rejected the prosecution's first-degree murder charge against Aaron McKinney, 22, finding that the brutal attack was not premeditated. Felony murder was applied in the case because McKinney also was convicted of aggravated robbery and kidnapping. McKinney betrayed no emotion as the verdict from a jury of seven men and five women was read in the Albany County courthouse. The onetime roofer faces the death penalty or life in prison when the trial moves to the sentencing phase, which begins Thursday.

McKinney and his friend Russell Henderson lured Shepard, a freshman at the University of Wyoming, from a local bar, drove him to a remote spot and robbed and beat him. The two tied Shepard, 21, to a fence and left him for dead. They took $20, two credit cards and Shepard's patent leather shoes. Shepard was found 18 hours later and died Oct. 12, 1998, in a Colorado hospital. He had never regained consciousness.

Henderson pleaded guilty last April in a plea bargain and is serving two life sentences.

The death of the boyish college student ignited national debate over hate crimes and violence against homosexuals. Shepard, a political science major interested in human rights, is now synonymous with a number of gay-rights causes. David M. Smith of the Human Rights Campaign, one of several gay-rights groups monitoring the trial, said the verdict offered justice, "but certainly no joy." "The verdict will do nothing to bring Matthew back, but hopefully it will send a message to would-be gay bashers that there are serious consequences involved with violent anti-gay behavior."

Others following the trial noted that the jury's rejection of the first-degree murder charge signaled something of a victory for the defense and mas indicate that the panel is reluctant to impose the death penalty.

The jurors – some of whom had cried after being shown graphic crime scene and coroner's photographs – deliberated for 10 hours beginning Tuesday, after hearing emotional closing arguments. Prosecutor Cal Rerucha told the jury, "Matthew Shepard was not an animal on a fence. Matthew Shepard was a human being." He called McKinney a savage and "wolf" who preyed on the lamb-like Shepard.

During closing arguments public defender Dion Custis said that McKinney was provoked into "five minutes of emotional rage and chaos" after Shepard grabbed McKinney's genitals and licked his ear while in McKinney's truck. Custis said that McKinney's experience of being molested as a child and a youthful sexual experience with a male cousin left him angry and confused. Custis admitted that his client pummeled Shepard but he characterized McKinney as having been on an alcohol and methamphetamine binge and argued that Shepard's alleged sexual overture on the night of the attack triggered McKinney's murderous reaction. Custis often referred to McKinney, a high school dropout, by his nickname, Dopey, and told the jury, "He's not that bright."

Voigt ruled the defense was tantamount to temporary insanity, which is not allowed in Wyoming, that evidence will be allowed in the sentencing phase.

It is rare that a jury in Wyoming ever considers imposing a death penalty. Since capital punishment was reinstated in Wyoming in 1977, only one person has been put to death, in 1992.

A wider view of hate crimes

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

A year ago, the brutal murder of Matthew Shepard made headlines across the nation, bringing an unprecedented outcry of grief. Massive vigils were held across the country, and his funeral became the site of a media frenzy. A photograph of the fence to which he was tied and left for dead appeared on the front cover of Time. There was an unprecedented outcry to include crimes motivated by a victim's sexual orientation in federal hate crimes laws.

There is no question that the huge amount of press devoted to Shepard's death was a landmark for the gay rights movement. Yet one has to wonder where the swarms of reporters were when Billy Jack Gaither was killed.

"Who?" you ask? Billy Jack Gaither, a 39-year-old gay man, was lured from a bar in Sylacauga, Alabama, by Charles Monroe Butler, 21, and Steven Eric Mullins, 25. Butler and Mullins led Gaither to a secluded area, badgeomed him to death with an ax handle, and burned his body on a stack of tires. The killers' motivation was that Gaither was a homosexual. While Shepard become the patron saint of the gay rights movement, Gaither and the scores of others have been killed in the last year on the basis of their sexual orientation. The press is to be lauded for their exhaustive coverage of Shepard's case. Yet their silence on other equally noteworthy deaths has given many Americans the impression that anti-gay murders are an uncommon occurrence.

The statistics on hate crimes motivated by sexual orientation are staggering. During 1995, 2,212 attacks on lesbians and gay men were documented by the National Coalition of Anti-Violence Programs - an 8 percent increase over 1994. Furthermore, the attacks have become more violent. 26% of the victims suffered serious injury or death. Among the attacks mentioned in the Coalition's report:

In Jackson Heights, New York, a 24-year-old gay man who was distributing HIV-related information was assaulted with a knife by a 17- year-old man. The victim suffered a severe cut on his elbow requiring medical attention. The perpetrator repeatedly referred to the victim as "faggot."

In Washington, D.C., three men accosted a gay man walking in a park and, at gun-point, forced him to go under a bridge. There, they beat him viciously. Before losing consciousness, he heard one of his assailants say, "We're going to teach this fucking faggot a lesson!"

Members of the UMass GLBT community may consider themselves immune to these sorts of attacks based on the fact that they attend a liberal campus in a gay-friendly area. Hate crimes can happen anywhere at anytime. There is no region of the US free from homophobia. At a gay rights vigil in Northampton last year, motorists screamed obscenities at the crowd through their car windows. If this sort of hatred exists in one of a town nicknamed "Lesbianville", it exists everywhere. The solution doesn't lie in tougher laws or massive press coverage – it lies in education.

The Coming Week in GLBT History

Nov. 6: In 1984, West Hollywood becomes an independent city. Residents of the city elect two gay men and a lesbian to the five-person city council, making it the first US city to have an openly gay majority on its governing body.

Nov. 7: In 1978, California voters reject "Proposition 6", which would have banned gay people, as well as anyone "advocating a homosexual lifestyle" from teaching in public schools.

Nov. 8: In 1977, Harvey Milk is elected to the San Francisco Board of Supervisors, becoming the first openly gay city official in a major city.

Come watch "Chasing Amy" on the Pride Alliance's Movie Night this Tuesday at 7 p.m. in the Student Union's Duke's Room.

Rock quartet comes to NoHo

By Caroline Fullmer
Collegian Correspondent

Anybody up for Maceo Parker, Miles Davis, or The Grateful Dead, wait no longer, experience the musical influence of such greats through a little known band called the Miracle Orchestra. A quartet formed in Boston, in 1996 is the music of a skillful guitarist, blending riffs with the smooth tones of a saxophone, and being complimented by a funky bass and a creative drummer. Genres such as Jazz, Indian, African, Reggae and Funk weave in and out of each other to become one unified statement to form the collective mind and heart of the Miracle Orchestra. The band strives to make improvisational music that can not only be danced to, but also listened to.

The name may sound familiar to all you Phish fans out there, Miracle Orchestra opened up for Phish during their well-attended Bonnaroo Festival, as well as appeared with such groups as The Derek Trucks Band, Los Lobos, and The Funky Meters. Miracle Orchestra has been known to cover such classics as The Grateful Dead's "Shakedown Street" and Medeski, Martin and Wood's "Bubble House", but don't look past their original music. Miracle Orchestra makes and performs music that delights the soul, and moves the body. Their latest album, Live Volume One is a collection of the band's most memorable moments on stage, not to be confused with Phish's A Live One. Their debut album Coalescne has sold over 1,000 copies, and no doubt will sell more, the more this band is heard. All their CDs are available at their shows, on their website (www.miracleorchestra.com), and at retailers such as Tower Records or Newbury Comics. The band is scheduled to release a full-length studio album in spring 2000. Not bad for a band consisting of four college students, all attending schools specializing in music. These guys aren't just playing what they think sounds good; they're what their college education taught them sounds good. And we all know a band with an education in music is one not be overlooked.

Dynamic, dramatic, and creative, this band makes music that is both highly compositional and improvisational. Using a saxophone, guitar, drums, bass, and vocals Miracle Orchestra makes a tribal groove sound that is impossible not to dance to. The Orchestra regularly draws crowds of over 500 to Boston's hippest music venues, such as the House of Blues, the Somerville Theater and the Middle East. Miracle Orchestra has also performed at such well-known places as The Higher Ground in Burlington Vt. and the renowned Wetlands in New York City. Boston Magazine awarded Miracle Orchestra with Boston's Best Upstart Jazz Group in 1998, and New York's Village Voice proclaims "Miracle Orchestra is an eclectic music-school trained quartet that comes off earnest on record but unpeels strongly on stage, do not miss!" However, even with all the recent hype these four guys feel most at home in small club settings where they can get personal with the crowd, and get energy off the people hooping down in the back (you know who you are).

DO NOT miss this act; catch them at the Iron Horse before you have to see them in the Calvin or even bigger venues. If Medeski calls your name, if Phish tickles you right, and if Miles Davis puts you in the mood, go buy your tickets for Miracle Orchestra so your body can groove.

Unique Holocaust documentary details one man's moving experience

Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

This weekend the Northampton Film Festival returns to Smith College with its wide assortment of documentaries, comedy, and feature films by independent filmmakers. While many of this weekend's films are promising, one in particular stands out. "Nothing's Changed" is an original documentary about one man's journey into his troubled past.

"Nothing's Changed" is not an ordinary documentary though, for a couple of reasons. First of all, the documentary is about the Holocaust. And this isn't the Steven Spielberg, Schindler's List, version either. Rather, "Nothing's Changed" takes a retrospective look at the event from one man's unique perspective.

Michael Edelstein, a successful New York real estate magnate, returns to a Ukrainian forest where he hid from Nazis as a 9-year old boy. During this journey, Edelstein retraces the path of safety he used to avoid the horror around him. He meets the son of a Ukrainian woman who risked his life to bring him food, while he hid in a self-made bunker. He confronts another woman who turned him away when he begged her for food over fifty years earlier. He even finds the exact haystack where he hid, as well as the restored cemetery where his loves ones were buried.

Using over five hours of interviews mixed with on-camera dialogue and no announcer voice-over, director Jesse Cogan takes a unique approach to Mr. Edelstein's tale. Trained in the gratuitous world of advertising, Cogan brings his background to this very human tale. Cogan comments on the multi-sourced interview technique by saying, "The effect is a stream of consciousness rather than a historical documentary about one man's journey into his troubled past.

Cogan, who widely lectures Jewish community about "branding" as well as advertising, stresses the importance of this story today, that it is not a story of the past.

Cogan explains: "It is about a man's return, not his past experiences," concluding "Its message about the power of memory and the effects of childhood oppression are universal."Nothing's Changed will screen Sunday, November 7th at Wright Hall on the Smith College Campus.

Annie production bland

By Kristi Ceccarossi
Collegian Staff

Inconsistent plots, over-exaggerated acting, and anything for a laugh or a tug on the heartstrings aren't formulas found only in bad movies. Musical theatre also produces a lot of show with so many holes that the story ceases to exist. All that remains are a collection of well-known songs, interrupted by scenes where characters are hyperbolic with non-sequential reactions. A sloppy production that relies on nothing more than its name and mainstream appeal for success. And Wednesday night the Concert Hall housed a perfect example of this with Annie.

You have to be suspicious of a show that gives itself the reputation and advertising look of a national tour, but only plays in a venue for one night, like our Annie did. I believe the inner circles of theatre people refer to these types of tours as "hus 'n' tracks" Financially, they are a notch above community theatre. And while they claim to be working under the original Broadway design, they are actually just copying all they can remember seeing in the real tours.

It's difficult to know where to begin, when the most impressive aspect of the show was the well-behaved dog that played Sandy. I have the feeling that he has more stage experience than the real "actors" in the show did. However, most of the major problems were largely at the fault of the casting board and design team. Some examples: Miss Hannigan (Victoria Oscar) was forced to wear a clown wig and frightening, deliberately smudged make up. Oscar did her best to work within those confines and played her role as more of a psychotic, evil (clown) than the drunk and depressed woman her character actually is. It's unfortunate that everyone thinks Daddy Warbucks (Patrick J. Cogan) has to be bald. He might have been easier to watch, if he didn't look exactly like Uncle Fester. And, why would anyone think they could get away with casting two woman, clearly over twenty-five, as orphans? Especially when the rest of them are played by real little girls.

But even an appropriate set of costumes and stern directing wouldn't save this cast. Granted it's difficult to find a ten year-old girl who has a handle on what it means to act, but it's not impossible. Melissa Rocco as Annie didn't even pretend she knew what she was doing. Her lines were all shouted with the same level of "emotion" and her facial expression never changed. Kimberly Stout as Grace Farrell was entirely disinterested in her role. And Justin Thyme (yes, his name is Justin Thyme) as FDR was apparently trying to illustrate the President's lesser-known, mentally retarded side.

The plot seemed to completely fall apart as the show progressed, and as it did, the performers became less aware that they were on stage at all. Thomas Meehan, who provided the book for the show, must have entered his mid-life crises before he finished the final scenes. All of the possible conflicts in the show are dropped as Annie forgets, within seconds after F.D.R. tells her (don't ask why) that her real parents are dead and happily runs over to Daddy Warbucks yelling "I love you!" Rooster and Lily St. Regis, who are posing as Annie's real parents to scoop up $50,000 from Warbucks enter the scene, don't even notice that the President is sitting in the room, and get "arrested" by Warbucks' butler. I found myself laughing out loud during scenes that had no humorous intentions because the most ridiculous, though subtle, things were happening. One of the house staff at Warbucks' mansion rolled onto the stage with a tricycle for Annie (eleven year olds do not ride tricycles) while Justice Brandeis, of all people, enters the house to conduct the adoption ceremony.

But, hey, everybody loves the songs in Annie. Who couldn't enjoy hearing "Tomorrow" sung by a little cherub with an occasionally sweet, child voice? Who couldn't enjoy hearing "Tomorrow" reprised five different times throughout the show? (Incidentally, not one cast member had an inspiring voice.) Well-packaged cheese is misconceived as what musical theatre is all about. Although I doubt it, perhaps that's what this production of Annie deliberately indulged in. Don't have any regrets if you missed it. This is one rare, but definite case of the movie being a better representation than the show.

A look at films currently in release

Three Kings
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters
Three Kings is the story of four soldiers who find an Iraqi map leading to stolen Kuwaiti gold. The movie is not only well-written, well-directed, and very entertaining, but also extremely relevant. A- (Adam Martignetti)

American Beauty
Playing at Pleasant St. Theater
American Beauty takes a fascinating look at the afflicted to be found in middle class culture, the neurotic tions to be found in middle class culture, the neurotic human drama that potentially plays out behind every white picket fence in America. Materialism, homophobia, the innocence and non-innocence of youth, and the hypocritical nature of American ideals are all present, woven into the characters' internal struggles. This is truly one of the best films of the year. A (David Troupes)

Double Jeopardy
Playing at Showcase Cinemas, Springfield
Double Jeopardy takes its incredibly lame-sounding name from the legal institution by which someone cannot be tried for the same crime twice. Except for a few instances of humor and a handful of scenes that approached being suspenseful, this movie is barely worth the $5.50 for a Blockbuster rental. Instead, stare at an Ashley Judd poster for a while, and then watch U.S. Marshalls. C- (David Troupes)

The Sixth Sense
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters
The Sixth lies somewhere between psychological thriller, intense realism and science fiction, slowly opening the viewer's eyes to a singularly bizarre arrangement. Bruce Willis gives a surprisingly solid lead performance as Dr. Malcolm Crowe, a clinical psychologist specializing in children. Crowe becomes involved with Cole, a troubled young boy who confides in Crowe that he can see dead people. A (David Troupes)

Three to Tango
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters
Three to Tango is one of the most obvious, poorly conceived, shoddy movies that I have ever seen. Everyone, including his female desire Amy (Neve Campbell), thinks Oscar Novak (Matthew Perry) is gay; he isn't. Hilarity is supposed to ensue; it doesn't. The poor writing gives us skin-deep stereotypes as characters and the directing is absolutely inept.
F (Adam Martignetti)

The Story of Us
Playing at Showcase Cinemas, Springfield
Can a marriage survive 15 years of marriage? A more relevant question: can an audience survive 90 minutes of human drama that potentially plays out behind every this movie? Not easily. The Story of Us never accomplishes more than a shallow treatment of marriage, with a couple of lukewarm laughs thrown in to keep you from falling asleep. C- (David Troupes)

Bringing Out the Dead
Playing at Showcase Cinemas, Springfield
Bringing Out the Dead takes an eccentric, heavily stylized look at the life of a paramedic struggling for sanity in an insane environment. Nick Cage plays a paramedic consumed by his work; he starts seeing patients whom he didnit save. The movie suffers from overimportant direction that indulges in its music video-like rhythm, but the picture it creates of the lives of the characters has an undeniably fascinating power. B (David Troupes)

Fight Club
Playing at Showcase Cinemas, Springfield
You cannot imagine the strangeness that is Fight Club. The narrator and Tyler, his new anarchistic friend, start an underground arena in which men can reclaim their sense of masculinity and empowerment by beating each other bloody. A (David Troupes)

House on Haunted Hill
Playing at Showcase Cinemas, Springfield
This is perhaps the worst scary movie Ive ever seen; it is the soulless product of a Hollywood studio that knew it wouldnt have to make any effort to turn a profit. Avoid at all costs. F (David Troupes)

Choral Spectrum brings together 200+ singers

By: Kristi Ceccarossi
Collegian Staff

Oliver Wendell Holmes once said "Alas for those that never sing, but die with all their music in them" Dr. Wayne Abercrombie, director of the University Chorale and Chamber Choir is trying his best to see that nobody in the five-college community goes without expressing their music. He's a major advocate and coordinator, though not the only one, for the upcoming Choral Spectrum. This weekend in the concert hall over two hundred voices will come together in song to celebrate the power of harmonious declaration. Because, as Dr. Abercrombie describes it, "there is something magical about people uttering something at the same time."

And history across cultures would tell us that his theory holds weight. We can trace the presence of united voices from Greek drama, ritual chants, war cries, the universal archive of music all the way up through athletic cheers. The voice is our most direct means of communication; it carries our most accessible form of articulation. It's something worth honoring. With a program that includes seven different choral groups from the University and two from outside of UMass, that's just what this weekend's performance will do.

Like far too many organizations, particularly those in support of the arts on campus, our choral program doesn't receive the attention that it deserves. While this is largely the result of such an expansive community, Dr. Abercrombie also suspects that it goes without enough notice because of an unfortunate myth that the arts – that is anything outside of the popular realm – is not for the general public. He worries that students too often do only what they're comfortable doing. As he very wisely perceives it, college is about challenging your limits, trying something you wouldn't ordinarily try. He has hopes then that he can first get half of the faculty and student population to recognize that our choral program exists, and then retain some of them as an audience and participants.

The University's history includes a constant connection to music. What started as student established glee clubs has evolved into one of the foremost pre-professional programs in the state. Not only does the music department cater to students aspiring to a career in music; it also provides a variety of opportunities for students content to hold music as a recreation. Two of the larger choruses performing at the Spectrum feature not only music-majors, but a vast collection of non-majors as well. All involved in the choral program, regardless of major, are invited to develop refined skills and it is then up to them to decide where to take them.

This is the first effort the choral program has made to bring all of its divisions together. The evening will feature a full range of voices and styles as the schedule includes the University Chorale, the Chamber Choir, the Madrigal Singers, the Women's Choir, the Opera Workshop, the Vocal Jazz Ensemble, the Collegium, and special guests Amherst Regional High School Chorale and Springfield's Children's Chorus. Nostalgic, traditional, non-sensical, and religious (among other) songs will be performed in several different languages.

Dr. Abercrombie is on to something important. College is the place to learn about something you wouldn't find the offer to learn about everyday: there are endless occasions now to test yourself. Incidentally, they are all really cheap and within walking distance. The Spectrum is about exploring the possibilities of choral music, and if you wait until later to do that, another chance may elude you forever.

The program will begin at 7:30 p.m. in the Concert Hall this Saturday. Tickets are still available by calling the Arts box office at 545-2511.

Theatre Guild "debuts" its past

By Kristi Ceccarossi
Collegian Staff

This Friday night the UMass Theatre Guild will take a trip down memory lane. The group will produce, for the first time, a revue celebrating their efforts over the past ten years to produce musical theatre to the five college community. Their program will include songs from rock operas Tommy and Jesus Christ Superstar to classics like Into the Woods and Pippin. The show is scheduled in conjunction with Something Every Friday and South Park: Bigger Long and Uncut will be presented following their performance in the Campus Center Auditorium. Admission is free.

Ari Teplitz, chairman of the Guild and co-chairperson of this event said of Decade, "this started as an idea of the executive board, as we were looking to do something that would allow more people to get involved. We wanted something that would be fun for UMTG and everyone on campus."

Kelly Ristaino, a senior theatre major at UMass is directing A Decade of Memories. Last spring she directed the very successful Guild production of Little Shop of Horrors. Although the program will include many Guild memories, it is bringing together new and old members.

A Decade of Memories features nineteen songs from eighteen of the Guild's twenty-one musicals this past decade. Teplitz continues, "we've done so many amazing shows with so many songs that people know and love. We felt that performing them all would appeal to a wide audience."

Sarah Paiva, Treasurer of the Guild and co-chairperson for the production describes the event as "a wonderful opportunity for the University to learn about the Guild." So, find your way to the Campus Center Friday night if you haven't already attended a Guild production. And if you can't make it, this isn't the last you'll hear from them this semester. Their production of Craig Lucas' Reckless is coming later this month, and their fall musical, Stephen Sondheim's Company, will be performed early in December.

Hargrove leaves Cleveland's home for comfy Chair at Camden Yard

[illegible] more than anything, is why [illegible] Angels picked the right [illegible] Wednesday, even if [illegible] are his style and handling [illegible] these legitimate criticism [illegible] final run in [illegible]

[illegible] Baltimore Link could do [illegible] start to the improvement. Jim [illegible] Trading for the first major [illegible] Pittsburgh general [illegible] Thrift hired him over [illegible] Al Heaverlo in 1985.

[illegible] most intriguing [illegible] Baltimore GM John Hart [illegible] Chair out from under him [illegible] Hargrove wanted to get [illegible] with another club.

"I don't need this job," Hargrove [illegible] telling Angelos in his inter[illegible] "I want this job."

Wanted it even though he is [illegible] fifth manager in seven sea-sons. Wanted it even though he had no choice but to return "most" of the Orioles' coaches. Wanted it even though The Chair in Baltimore is a hot seat like none other.

Hart talked about finding a "new energy" when he fired Hargrove. Well, maybe the events of the past three weeks will give Hargrove a "new energy." He would never say as much, but maybe he will be a better manager. Maybe he has something to prove.

"He's managed in the big leagues for eight years, but he's always been with the same team," his wife, Sharon, was saying Wednesday. "We have five kids. With my first one, I did things different than I did with my fifth. You learn and you change, but you can't change mid-stream sometimes.

"I think there are things Mike will do differently. But I think he'll do a lot of things the same. I've known Mike since the seventh or eighth grade in our little hometown in Texas. He's pretty much the same person I met then. What you see is what you get."

And what will the Orioles will get? A manager who isn't as dynamic as Phil Garner or Don Baylor, but a manager who might have won a World Series if his pitching staff in Cleveland had included an ace like Mike Mussina.

The question with Miller was his competence. The question with Perlozzo or Little, at least at the start, might have been the same. But with Hargrove, the discussion can return to baseball again.

True, Hargrove failed to list a designated hitter on his lineup card for one game last season, and his Indians often showed similar inattention to detail. He never criticized his players publicly, occasionally creating the impression that he is coddling them - the last thing the Orioles need.

Hargrove, though, said that he reserves his eruptions for private meetings, claiming, "I can get as mad as anyone you've ever seen." He said that he is a disciplinarian, "to a point." He also said that every player on Team Double Standard will be subject to the same rules.

"To be a team you have to do that, yes," Hargrove said.

Before becoming a manager, he was a major-league player for 12 seasons, a minor-league manager for three, a major-league coach for 13. Sharon Hargrove said this will be the family's 88th move. Baltimore will be their 18th city. Maryland their 11th state.

Naturally, Sharon encouraged her husband to take a year off, collect the $600,000 the Indians owed him and help their 18-year-old son, Andrew, decide where he wanted to play baseball in college.

"'95 was fun," she said of the Indians' first postseason run under Hargrove. "Since then, it has not been as much fun."

And it all culminated on Oct. 15, when Hargrove was made the scapegoat for the Indians' upset loss to Boston in the Division Series.

"I was real glad our fifth-grader went to school and the teacher mentioned, 'You know, obviously everyone knows Shelly's dad lost his job. And Shelly, we're going to help you get through this,'" Sharon said.

"But then, she said, 'Have any other kids had parents lose a job?' And hands started going up. It helped her to say, 'My dad is not the only one who ever lost a job.' She is so excited, she wanted to miss school and come with us."

Sharon was so excited, she allowed her husband to celebrate by smoking a cigar inside their Richfield, Ohio, home for the first time. And Mike was so excited, he talked Wednesday about his "blood boiling and roiling" in anticipation of returning to The Chair.

ily to UMass.

However, the Minutemen will not exactly be pushovers either. Recording two different four-game conference winning streaks this season, confrontations with UMass have not exactly been the highlight of most team's schedules. No team in the conference could defeat them at home, and two of their three road losses were one-goal decisions. UM also was able to knock off the then-12th-ranked in the nation Washington University in tournament play earlier this season.

Although the Maroon and White will enter the tournament as an underdog, when the teams are compared they are not all that different. Both teams have a strong offensive game generating goals in almost every appearance. Defensively both teams have quelled opposing conference offense, decisively winning most games. Each has had three players apiece named to the 1999 all-conference teams. Minuteman forward Adam Black was named to the first team, while teammates Fred Kinateder and Jonathan Bibb were on the second team. Both teams are coming off a loss as they head to this weekend, and both are very familiar with tournament competition, understanding that it is a situation where your have to win.

"Well, they are the top seed and we have nothing to lose," said Baron when asked about the match up with URI. "We're just hoping to get a better outcome than the first time."

True, the last time UM took the field against the Rams, it suffered its worst loss of the season, dropping the game 4-0. Hoping for a better outcome, the Minutemen have not forgotten that defeat and will attempt to even the score this evening. Whether they have to use the windmill, robot, or worm the Minutemen realize this is a dance they have to lead.

However, now the stakes have been upped and the cardboard has been laid down, as each will have to dig deep into their repertoire of moves to ensure that they advance on to Sunday to face the winner of the Duquesne and St. Bonaventure match.

"We haven't played to our full potential yet, but the first time around we squeezed out a win, so that's a good and a bad thing. Now with A-10's this weekend, we know that we need to step it up."

Top threats for Xavier include Annette Gruber, who leads the club with 39 points [16 goals, seven assists]. Complementing her offensively will be Christie Reinshagen [13 points], Megan Hosty [10 points] and Margaret Broe [10 points].

On the UMass side of things, senior forward Emma Kurowski leads the Minutewomen with 30 points [13 goals, four assists]. Junior Kara Green is second on the squad with 21 points [seven goals, seven assists], while senior Cindy Garceau and sophomore Katelyn Jones are third on the team with 12 points apiece.

"There's a lot of things on the line. The loser goes home and we don't want to go home on day one of our own tournament," Rudy said.

Should the Minutewomen advance to Sunday's final, they will be facing a club that defeated them in A-10 play during the regular season. Both Dayton and St. Bonaventure beat UMass at Totman earlier this year.

"If we are fortunate enough to get to the finals, there would certainly be incentive enough there," Rudy said. "We have a debt to pay to either one of those teams."

Dayton is led by freshman phenom Missy Gregg, who 50 points on the season [21 goals, eight assists]. After her, there is a considerable drop-off in scoring. Danielle Gillespie is the second leading scorer with 22 points [eight goals, six assists].

On the SBU side of things, top players include Keri Guminey and Jen Twardzik, along with goakeeper Karen Cunningham.

For now, though, the Minutewomen are hoping to finally come together and get back to the NCAA tournament after a one-year hiatus.

"It's been a building process since day one. We have the pieces of the puzzle, but sometimes it's a matter of putting them together," senior captain Robin Smith said. "We have so much more depth then we've been used to the past three years. Now we need to put things together if we want to keep [moving] forward."

Added Rudy: "I'd be tickled pink if we won the A-10's. It would be great. I think that this team deserves to win it, and I think that we can win it."

Kara Green was named to the second team All Atlantic-10 squad, leading the Minutewomen with seven assists on their way to a 12-4-1 record.

With Cadets in the dust, hockey looks for HE pair

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

Momentum will be on the side of the Massachusetts hockey team as it hits the ice this weekend for a pair of against UMass-Lowell and New Hampshire.

The Minutemen [1-3, 0-2 in Hockey East] are coming off a 1-0 shutout of Army last Friday night in upstate New York. It was an affair that UMass totally controlled, outshooting the Cadets 36-19. Jeff Blanchard scored the game-winning goal for the Maroon and White 4:15 into overtime to help propel UMass to the win.

"It was a game that we really dominated. We had 36 shots, but they got great goaltending by Corey Winer," Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen said. "We got a clutch goal by Jeff Blanchard to secure the win."

"It was a good way to break into the win column. Now we've got to get our first Hockey East win," added Mallen.

UMass will get two chances to earn their first win inside the conference. The first will be tonight, when Lowell arrives in Amherst for a 7 p.m. face-off.

The River Hawks have stumbled out of the blocks to a 2-4 start. In their most recent game last Saturday night, Lowell dropped a 2-1 decision to New Hampshire at Tsongas Arena.

"Lowell is very deep and they have some very skilled forwards, guys like [John] Campbell and [Chris] Bell," Mallen said. "It's going to be one of those typical Hockey East games, a game that's anybody's [going to win]. We're just glad that we have it at our rink."

While Saturday's opponent, the Wildcats, are 4-2 through their first six games, they have lost two of their last three affairs. Yale defeated UNH 5-1 on Tuesday night in New Haven, Conn., while RPI shut down the Wildcats last Friday night at the Whittemore Center. Squeezed in between those two losses was win over Lowell on Saturday.

Game time is set for 7 p.m. in Durham, NH.

"Their facing some adverse conditions that have them questioning themselves right now. This is the perfect time for us to jump on them," Mallen said.

Offensively, UNH is led by forwards Darren Haydar and Mike Souza. Between the pipes, Wildcats coach Dick Umile relies on goalie Ty Conklin.

"They are a good all-around team, and I think that Ty Conklin and [UMass goalie] Markus Helanen are the two best goalies in the east, if not the country," Mallen said. "RPI's win was a little deceptive because they were drastically outshot [by UNH], and Yale was just a tough loss. They won't play on Friday, so they'll be ready for us at their rink."

On the UMass side of things, top threats include senior alternate captain Blanchard and junior alternate captain Jeff Turner. Both players are tied for the team lead with three points through the first three games. Senior captain Nathan Sell will also contribute up front for the Minutemen.

In goal, UMass will look to junior Markus Helanen to continue the winning streak. The Vantaa, Finland native stopped all 19 shots against Army to earn his first win of the season.

Up-and-down tennis season ends; Pair preapare for Eastern Rgionals

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

If you have ever been to Busch Gardens Theme Park in Williamsburg, Va., and have hopped on the Loch Ness Monster roller coaster, then you know exactly how the fall season has felt for the UMass women's tennis team. If not, maybe Space Mountain at Walt Disney World will do, or perhaps even one of those traveling carnival roller coasters that use a screw or a bolt with every creaky ride it dares to take.

After a long and tedious season, the Minutewomen head to Boston for the International Tennis Association Rolex Championships, taking place today through Tuesday in the brand new Murr Center at Harvard University. It is the first time Harvard has hosted this event.

Akin to the long line that awaits at the Loch Ness, however, the Minutewomen have been delayed with several postponements and cancellations, inevitably forfeiting a totally focused jump into the season. As the schedule finally began to play out, the Minutewomen found themselves seesawing up and down the entire time. The belief is that they weren't as dizzy as a partaker to the Loch Ness. That is a good thing.

The end of the fall season has finally laid its eyes upon the UMass women's tennis team. UMass fell 5-1 to Boston University in its final dual match of the fall season on Thursday in Boston with Gerasimova picking up the lone singles win against the Terriers. The Minutewomen finished the fall campaign 3-5 in dual matches. The duo of Gerasimova and sophomore Annie Hamilton finished at 4-1 at number one doubles in dual matches this season. Gerasimova and freshman Katie Stammen are 5-3 at number one and four singles, respectively.

The dual matches for the 1999 fall season are over, yet two Minutewomen can keep their rackets out of the closets for this weekend.

The pair will compete individually and together against players from 60 other schools. Coach Judy Dixon knows her players will represent the team well in Boston. Gerasimova went 6-5 during the fall season, while posting a 5-5 dual-match record. Hamilton made her statement for the Regionals at 5-6 overall with a 4-4 dual-match finish.

Gerasimova and Hamilton should fair pretty well against their competition. Both have showed strong determination and immense confidence in their game. It is Gerasimova's third appearance in the Regionals while Hamilton makes her first.

"How we do depends on our draw," Coach Dixon said. "Ola is probably one of the better unseeded players. This is a great opportunity for her and if she draws an unseeded player in the first round, she has a good chance to advance further into the tournament."

Dixon knows Gerasimova is quite ready and will take advantage of her chance. She has beaten quality players throughout the season and is coming off a demolishing victory over Selin Nassi of Boston University.

Head coach Judy Dixon will have to wait for the spring season to attempt to close in on her 100th UMass victory. Dixon, who is in her eighth season with the Minutewomen, needs just seven more victories to hit the century mark.

UM looks to blow by Latvian Selects

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Damn the torpedoes, full speed ahead!

Taking a cue from their basketball brethren, the Massachusetts Minutewomen will look to run their opposition right off the hardwood in tomorrow's exhibition opener at the William D. Mullins Center. Coach Jeanie O'Brien's troops will represent both the Maroon and White and the Red, White and Blue as they square off with the University of Latvia Select Team at 2 p.m.

UMass will boast a new look in many different ways heading into tomorrow's action. Gone is last year's board-crashing crew of Tez Kraft, Yolanda Rayside and Lucia Madajova. In its place has been installed a five member gang of towering young glass cleaners that O'Brien hopes will share the rebounding load for the Minutewomen.

"Rebounding is a mentality, it's an attitude, and those three kids [Kraft, Rayside and Madajova] had it," O'Brien said. "How you replace them, I don't know. But if the post players do their job... I think we can take care of that."

At the top (literally) of UM's list of fab freshmen are centers Jennifer Butler and Stasia Robinson, the tallest players on the team at 6-foot-3. Both hail from the Empire State, where Butler was named first team All-New York City and Robinson garnered All-State honors. Both players averaged a double-double in points and rebounds per game, while Robinson also established herself as a certified swatter with 4.5 blocks per contest.

More height-enhanced help will come from first-year swing players Kristin Cannon and Amber Sneed, twin Buckeye State bangers with excellent scoring capabilities. Guard Cannon, listed at 5-foot-11, was named Cardinal Division Player of the Year after averaging 14.2 points and 5.3 boards per game as a senior at Reynoldsburg High. The 6-foot Sneed made the All-Conference First Team after chalking up 12.5 points, 7 rebounds and 2 steals per contest at Cincinnati's Princeton High.

Rounding out the quality rookie quintet is Ebony Pegues. O'Brien's lone early signee who also hails from Ohio. The 5-foot-9 guard led her Brookhaven High team to the Columbus City Championship and a 20-3 record last season, averaging 12.5 points, 4.2 boards and 7.3 assists per game along the way.

The new faces O'Brien has brought in are perfectly suited to the revamped game plan the coach is implementing for the '99-'00 season. The team will stick to its guns as far as keeping rebounding and defense as its highest priorities, but will wrap its fundamentals in an up-tempo style on both sides of the ball. Both the freshmen and the veteran core will be called upon to press, trap and run in transition, as the Minutewomen will try to exhaust their opponents with run-and-gun basketball.

This exciting new style will undoubtedly start at the point, where junior Kathy Coyner will run the show for the Maroon and White. The fourth Ohio original on O'Brien's roster, Coyner started every game for the Minutewomen last year and proved that she's just as comfortable pulling up to stick the jumper, as she is putting her head down and going to the hole. The tri-captain will also be a key on "D", especially in O'Brien's full-court press.

Teaming with Coyner in the UM backcourt will be another of the team's tri-captains, senior Alison McFarland. The 5-foot-9 New Jersey native brings to this year's team both a valuable veteran presence and devastating offensive range that should perfectly complement O'Brien's inside muscle.

"You can't win without good guards," O'Brien said. "Kathy and Alison will control what we do and how we do it. I feel comfortable with what I'm going to get from them, especially with Kathy running the point."

The inside muscle comes courtesy of sophomore twin towers Caroline Nehls and Nekole Smith, forward-centers who both reach 6-foot-1. Smith made the Atlantic 10 All-Rookie team last year, establishing herself as a strong rebounder with solid one-on-one skills. Nehls jumped out to a powerful start last season, before being sidelined with a stress fracture in her right leg.

"Caroline and Nekole are a year older and a year wiser," O'Brien said. "They will be the anchors down inside."

The new and improved roster and game plan will also get a lift from a new member of O'Brien's coaching staff, Jackie Moore comes east from New Mexico to take over the assistant coaching vacancy left by Chris Dagan's departure after a six year stint at the helm of the Santa Fe Community College team.

The University of Latvia Select Team presents UMass with an interesting challenge, as this group is composed of primarily older players with a good deal of size between them. 6-foot-4 center Zanda Redata should give Robinson and Butler a good workout on the blocks, but it's unlikely the Latvians will be able to run with the new-look Minutewomen.

Kathy Coyner and the Minutewomen kick off the '99-00 campaign when they take on the Latvia Select team tomorrow night at the Mullins Center.

A-10 tourney looms v-ball needs sweep

By Seth Szilagyi
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts volleyball team is on the teeter-totter for an entrance into the Atlantic 10 Conference post season, unfortunately for the Minutewomen the latkid is on the other end holding them down.

Currently in seventh place in the A-10 conference at 6-6 [12-11], the Minutewomen need key victories against Duquesne and Fordham this weekend to try and make it to the A-10 tourney.

Last Saturday, UMass had a strong showing at home against Rhode Island, but managed to stumble backwards, losing 3-0 to out-of-conference rival Connecticut.

Junior Rebecca Hasson led the team in kills in the loss with 12 kills, while senior Kari Hogancamp continued her fantastic final year, posting another double-double which included 10 kills and a team-high 21digs.

Rebecca Hasson

The Minutewomen hit an offensively anemic .131 for the match, as their dazzling defense from Saturday didn't carry over, letting the Huskies hit .284.

One positive for the squad are the records of the two teams they are facing for the weekend. Duquesne is in eighth place in the conference with a record of 3-10, while the Rams are even worse at 1-12 in the conference.

The Minutewomen will have to recharge their ferocious façade of defense and contain senior Anita Ball who leads the Dukes in kills with 3.66 per game, while also keeping all eyes on Mindy Buhrow who tops the team in digs with 2.81 per game. UMass easily took the previous meeting this year, shooting down Duquesne, 3-0.

"I'm glad we are playing them at home because we need to jump on them right away," said head coach Bonnie Kenny. "They have the personnel that can be very dangerous, so we need to make sure we are ready to play.

The next opposition for the Minutewomen will be the Fordham Rams who hold the dubious distinction of being 10th in the A-10. With only one win in the conference a five game match against Lasalle, the Rams are looking for some respect among the conference elite, but are knocking on the wrong door, as they are 1-8 against the Minutewomen all-time. Fordham boasts senior Tibana Saffila who is averaging 2.74 kills per game, as her and teammate sophomore Emily Saltzman are tied for the team-high in digs per game with 2.57.

In the Minutewomen will counter both the Dukes and Rams attack with the senior duo of Jill Meyers and Hogancamp. Meyers leads the team in kills posting 4.56 per game also ranking second in digs with 3.54 per game. Hogancamp continues to impress leading the team and the nation in digs per game with an average of 5.25. Not only a defensive force, Hogancamp also places second on the team in kills with 3.48 per game.

Hasson has turned it on of late, pushing her block average to 1.23 per game, all while ranking third on the team in kills with 3.01 per game.

"Both these teams have nothing to lose and nothing to gain," Kenny said. "We still have an outside shot of making it into the conference tournament, so there's a little more pressure on us this weekend. We need to take away their tendencies, so we don't make it any more difficult than it already is this weekend."

Will the Minutewomen sweep and make a run at the conference tournament? Find out tonight in the Curry Hicks Cage, as they face Duquesne at 7p.m., then again on Nov. 6 against Fordham. Same time. Same Cage.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Just when you're ready to ask for some help, someone who said he or she would "always be there" for you may turn up missing today.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Take care that your temper doesn't get the better of you today. Your more volatile emotions must be kept in check at this time.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – That devil-may-care attitude may be just the thing for attracting others into your orbit, but you must be ready to face related dangers.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – That which seems to make little sense today is worth your attention. You can be sure that the most important messages are likely to be disguised.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – There is no need for you to run and hide today. Going underground in such a way will only serve to fuel your enemies and make people talk.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You're likely to find yourself at the "top of the hill" today, so you'd better prepare for a challenge to come your way.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – After a rough start today, you'll be back in the swing of things remarkably soon, showing off your skill with grace and style.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – It's a good day to consider broadening your horizons, but you must be willing to do it your way. You needn't follow in anyone's footsteps.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – It's important today that you address key issues in the proper sequence. Working out of order can only threaten your rate of progress.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Never make the mistake of thinking it's too late. With imagination and a little extra effort, you can surely come through – even at the last minute.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Others are likely to benefit well today from a product of your own imagination and ingenuity. Don't hold back. Share freely what you have.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – This is a good day to consider mounting a large-scale, cooperative effort in order to achieve a major common goal. You have got the goods today!

UM soccer in search of an A-10 crown

Kurowski lands Player of the Year
Totman hosts conference tourney

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

For one team, the road to the NCAA tournament will run through Amherst this weekend.

The Massachusetts, Dayton, Xavier and St. Bonaventure women's soccer teams will battle it out over the next three days in the Atlantic 10 tournament. Totman Field will host the conference championship.

Today's first game will pit No. 1 seed Dayton against No. 4 St. Bonaventure at noon. UMass (11-4-1), who has earned the No. 2 spot, will take on Xavier at 2:30 p.m. The two semifinal winners will then meet on Sunday at noon to determine which club will earn the automatic bid to the NCAA's.

Fans will come out in full force as Robin Smith and five other seniors make their final appearance at Totman Field this weekend in the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

The Minutewomen will enter today's game with a 1-0 loss to St. Bonaventure on Sunday still fresh in their minds. However, the Maroon and White must put that behind them if they want to come away winners of the A-10 tournament.

"After last weekend, I'm approaching this weekend with very guarded optimism. I think our people we're humbled by last weekend's loss, and their focus seems to be here now," UMass women's soccer coach Jim Rudy said. "But I also think that we need to be more consistent."

Xavier will be looking to avenge an earlier drubbing at the hands of the Minutewomen, Back on Oct. 15, UMass handled the Musketeers 5-1 at Totman Field.

"I thought that last time we played fairly well, but this time we need to get a full effort for 90 minutes," Rudy said. "Last time we came out quick, then dropped off right before the half, and then had some surges in the second half. We can't play like that this time around."

Said senior defender Kate Webb:

Black's 16 goals, third in the A-10, earn conference first team honors

By Matt Crocker
Collegian Staff

Not since the days of electric boogaloo, when the University hosted a breaking competition at the Fine Arts Center, has a UMass squad planned to dance its way over the competition and into the championship.

The Massachusetts men's soccer team will attempt to bust a move this weekend as they compete in the 13th annual Atlantic 10 postseason tournament. One of four teams whose record earned them a position in the tournament, Rhode Island, Duquesne and St. Bonaventure join the Minutemen in Dayton, Oh. to see whose got what it takes in the A-10.

Ranked fourth entering the tournament, the Maroon and White (13-6, 8-3 in A-10) will but heads this evening with the top seated U.R.I. Rams(14-3-1, 10-1 in A-10).

"I think we're going to look good, we have been training hard and everyone is working together as a unit," said senior midfielder Todd Baron when asked about the playing in the tournament. "We're mentally ready, we're getting focused and we're excited."

Yet, despite all the time the Minutemen have spent preparing for this game, they still have to contend with a team that can boast that they were the best team in the A-10 this season.

This happens to be a bragging right that is not just hot air, as the Rhode Island Rams have the ability to post numbers that would change the opinion of any Ram doubter. Decimating the A-10, the Rams only lost one conference game all season, to fellow championship contender Duquesne. Winning by shut out eight out of ten times, the URI defense has only allowed five goals in conference competition. On the other end of the field, the Rams offensive power has racked up three or more goals in all but two of their conference games this season. They have been equally dominant on the road and at home and will not fall eas-

Spiders hope web holds against UM

Minutemen look for fifth straight, UR for revenge

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

The 1998 football season brought to Amherst almost everything that the Massachusetts Minutemen could possibly want. Any awards that could be won were obtained – the national title, the Lambert Cup as the best team in the Eastern United States... except one – the Atlantic 10 Conference Championship.

"I told our players that we didn't do anything last year in this conference," UMass coach Mark Whipple said. "If we want to be on top, we have to beat the champion, and that's what Richmond is."

Richmond and Massachusetts will square off tomorrow at 1:00 p.m. at UR Stadium in Virginia. The Spiders' only A-10 loss last year came at the hands of the Minutemen, leaving both sides with a bone to pick with their opponent.

This time around, UMass holds a distinct advantage in the conference, with a 5-1 record (5-3 overall) compared to Richmond's 3-3 (5-3). Both squads have similar momentum heading into the contest, though. The Minutemen are the winners of four straight, including a 26-19 victory in the harsh environment of Delaware Stadium. The Spiders have racked up three consecutive wins, beating highly-touted Hofstra in Hempstead, N.Y. by double digits, 51-21. The same Flying Dutchmen handed UMass a 27-14 defeat on Oct. 2.

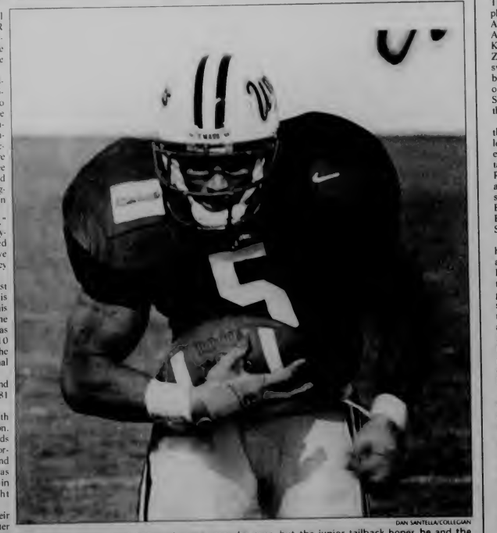
"They have the whole package," Whipple said. "They are as talented as anybody we have played. They dominated Hofstra in the second half, and we have great respect for Hofstra and the way they play the game. We are very concerned."

The leading cause of concern is most likely quarterback Jimmie Miles, who is responsible for 2,076 all-purpose yards this season so far. The senior is sixth all-time on the school's passing yardage list. He has carried the ball for 532 yards and 10 touchdowns this year to currently lead the team. Miles has gunned for an additional 16 scores as well.

His main targets are Dwaune Jones and Muneer Moore, who have combined for 81 catches and 14 touchdowns.

This offensive trio will hutt heads with the top defensive backfield in the nation. Led by safety Jeremy Robinson, who leads the team with six interceptions, and cornerback Jerard White, who is close behind with five, the UMass pass defense has picked off more passes than anyone else in the country, taking away 22 in eight games.

When the Minutemen get the ball, their main concern will likely be getting Walter Payton Award candidate Marcel Shipp back on track. The tailback rushed for only 48 yards a week ago against Rhode Island in a 31-9 blowout, ending his 19-game 100-yard rushing streak. The runner, with only one mediocre performance in nearly two years of play, will be expected to control the ball game for UMass on the ground. The junior needs only 183 yards to pass Minuteman all-time leader Rene Ingoglia, who racked up 4,824 yards between 1992-95.



Quarterback Todd Bankhead, who climbed into first place on the Massachusetts career passing yards and completions lists last week, will take the snaps and try to relieve Shipp of some pressure.

Last year, Bankhead hit Jimmy Moore from 18 yards out with 1:01 left to go to cap the Minutemen's 22-17 comeback victory over the Spiders. With Moore gone, Bankhead has gone to sophomore Adrian Zullo, who leads the Minutemen with 44 receptions, 689 yards and seven receiving touchdowns.

Picking up significant playing time on the other side of the offense will be youngster Jimmie Howard, who beat the Ram defense deep for two touchdowns over 89 yards a week ago.

"Jimmie Howard is a player who had a lot of I-A offers, but we hung with him and he eventually committed to us," Whipple said. "Adrian Zullo has taken a few knocks in the past few weeks, so we felt we needed to give him some help. We put Jimmie in and he made two great catches. We need

Marcel Shipp's streak of 100-yard games may be over, but the junior tailback hopes he and the Minutemen can make a return trip to the postseason.

Star-studded field hockey vies for tournament title

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

As honors fall like rain onto the Massachusetts field hockey team, the Minutewomen must keep their focus on blowing away the Red Storm of St. Joseph's in the first round of this weekend's Bell Atlantic 10 Tournament.

UMass (11-8, 5-0 A-10) will have to ignore the shower of accolades that resulted from the conference's regular season awards voting and concentrate on the task at hand to beat St. Joe's in today's 1 p.m. showdown. The Maroon and White placed four starters on the All-Atlantic 10 squad in Anke Bruemmer, Lacey Koch, Patty Robinson and Zowie Tucker, with sweeper Bruemmer also being named A-10 Player of the Year. Coach Patty Shea was also honored as the conference Coach of the Year.

Coach Patty Shea

All that recognition pales in light of the impending A-10 Tournament challenge. The Red Storm (11-7, 2-3 A-10) enjoys more than just home field advantage; the team also boasts the conference Rookie of the Year in Brett Dymarczyk and three All-Atlantic 10 selections in back Pam Bilger, forward Donna Burke and midfielder Siobhan Leavy.

The two teams locked horns earlier this season, in a September 24th battle at Richard F. Garber field. In the biggest regular season game of the year for both squads, the Minutewomen racked up a 16-7 shot advantage and cruised to a 2-0 shutout victory. Bruemmer scored both UMass goals on penalty corner shots, while fantastic defense by Patty Robinson and Lucy Koch helped shore up the win.

That defeat sent the Red Storm into an A-10 free-fall, as it lost subsequent games to Rhode Island and Temple, toppling down the conference standings.

As far as A-10 scoring is concerned, Bruemmer has truly been the cream of the conference crop. The German native led the A-10 in shots (77), goals (15), points (32) and game-winning goals (6) overall through 19 games. In five A-10 contests, Bruemmer socked home six goals and notched two assists to help UM go undefeated in conference play.

St. Joseph's certainly packs some offensive punch of its own, though. Leavy and Dymarczyk ranked second and third, respectively, in scoring amongst A-10 players this year. Leavy showed admirable balance with eight goals and 12 assists for 28 points, while Dymarczyk shattered all expectations with an 11 goal, 24 point rookie campaign.

The Maroon and White definitely holds the edge between the pipes in this match up. Welsh import Zowie Tucker has given Shea's troops the ultimate last line of defense, stopping 105 shots and pitching 4 and a half shutouts while allowing a scant 1.74 goals per game. While she has been helped by a stellar Koch-led defensive backfield, the flamboyant Tucker has no doubt given a lift to the entire team with her aggressive flair in net.

Red Storm keeper Lauren Bradley, on the other hand, has been somewhat porous at times en route to a 2.66 goals-against average.

She will need to step up her game in order to withstand the heat of UM's explosive offense. Only the Rams of URI took more shots this year than the Minutewomen, who showed incredible balance with 15 first-half goals and 18 second half goals.

Having sewn up the regular season A-10 title in convincing fashion, UMass is undoubtedly the favorite to win it all at the Philadelphia tourney. The Maroon and White have beaten all three teams in the bracket this year, by a combined score of 9-2.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Anke Bruemmer

Both of these goals-against were delivered by URI, whom the Maroon and White could very well face in tomorrow's title game. Rhode Island (8-11, 3-2 A-10) matches up very well against Shea's squad, while high scoring Rams Angela Bashore, Kelly Barnowski and Heather Lockhart ranked second, third and fourth in conference scoring this year. URI may have benefited from some liberal stat keeping, however; the Rams took 126 more shots than the Minutewomen, yet only tallied seven more goals.

An equally formidable foe is Temple (7-12, 4-1 A-10). The Owls were in cruise control up until their September 26th war with UMass, in which the Minutewomen prevailed 3-0 behind a career day from forward Lindsay Abbott (two goals). A pair of botched calls by the officials in that game no doubt left a bitter taste with the Temple, which could have an extra degree of motivation should it force a Saturday showdown with the Maroon and White.

HASA CASA unites in heritage celebration

By Victoria Salesman and Hugh Reid
Collegian Correspondents

For the past six years, the Haitian American Student Association and Casa Dominica have held HASA CASA. To many it is just an event during which the two organizations come together to celebrate their heritages. Yet this year, it seemed to be a new beginning for all. The theme for the night was a carnival, because it is used to introduce a pre-party before independence. With the dawn of a new millennium, the Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) felt that this was a perfect way to introduce a new beginning.

The events' keynote speaker was Alexandria Deschamps, assistant professor of women's studies. Deschamps, a native Dominiquan, delivered a speech on the role of the Caribbean woman, a "salute to women of the African Diaspora." Deschamps dedicated the speech to her mother, who recently passed away. It was around the time of her mother's death that Deschamps was invited to speak at HASA CASA. She said she was so overtaken with grief that she did not feel up to speaking, but she felt that the invitation was a sign from her mother. She believed that her mother was telling her that she had the strength and power within herself, as a woman, to move on and make a difference. It was indeed a new beginning for her.

There is a history of racial tension and hostility between Haiti and the Dominican Republic that goes back to the days of colonialism. This tension is magnified by the irony that the two peoples share the same mainland. Although they share a similar African ancestry, they have long existed as two separate peoples. Students Remon Jourdan, Sujeiry Gomez, and Genevieve Legros sang a collaborative poem that exemplified this theme. "We share the land, we share the sea, let's unify for liberty," they sang. Deschamps said she was very moved after speaking to the heads of both organizations, and said she sees that "there is hope for the future."

Deschamps asked students "to continue the challenge of ancestors long ago...Have visions and goals and attain them." Deschamps stressed "agency – the power within to change ourselves and impact the world around us." She spoke also about appearance, saying that outside appearance is not important, and that "we [black, West Indian women] have everything that everybody wants."

The program consisted of performances by cultural groups in which at least one member was of Haitian or Dominican heritage. HASA dancers, Neg et Negresse Kreyol, and CASA dancers, Cayena, flooded the floor with movements and music from the "old country." Their outfits were true to their native lands.

When the choreographer, Kristopher Simon, was asked about the inspiration of the final dance, he responded, "Always listen to the song first. The motions and movements were a part of the song. In the song, a couple breaks up, and the man attempts to get the lady back by begging her, and finally she gives in." It took the group over a month to get the dance together and perfected, but "[the dancers] were very dedicated. I am very proud."

"We had a good time preparing the dance, and as you saw from our performance we put a lot of energy and dedication into it. It was a true team effort," said Joanne Charles, a senior political science major.

The evening was capped off with the music from the Caribbean.

"The male trend for the night was felt hats," said junior Jerry Henry. When pulled away from the dance floor, designer Nick Clement, a junior apparel marketing major, said, "I felt accelerated when I saw my designs in motion. They danced beautifully."

"[I am] still shocked with the turnout. Even though we had a couple minor setbacks, I was still pleased that people were still gigging at 1:30 in the morning," Legros, president of HASA, said. "I want people to realize the importance of coming together. I believe in the old adage 'united we stand, divided we fall.' As long as we try to maintain in a sense of community and work toward achieving, than we will truly have new beginning."

Anti-School of Americas activists speak

By Jason Spears

Two prominent Latin American activists spoke out against the School of the Americas and for its closure last Thursday at Hampshire College.

Ann Tiffany and Ed Kinane both worked with Peace Brigades Interational to protect human rights workers against death squads whose leaders were trained at Fort Benning, GA., the grounds of the School of the Americas (SOA). They spoke at a forum organized by the Hampshire College Human Rights Group. The SOA, which has been implicated in the training of foreign nationals in techniques of terror, began training members of Latin American armies in Panama in 1946, according to Tiffany. The school's purpose was to promote democracy and stability in Latin America, but many Latin Americans saw it as having the opposite effect.

Panama said the SOA was the "strongest factor in the destabilization of countries in Central and Latin America."

During the negotiations of the Panama Treaty Canal, the SOA was asked to leave Panama as part of the treaty. This proposal led to the relocation of the SOA to Fort Benning in 1984. Tiffany said that at the time, most of the students in the school were Salvadoran.

TIME–UMass partnership sponsors student competition

These students in Dr. Kathleen Debevec's Promotional Strategies class are interns with TIME Magazine.

As part of an Industry-Education Partnership, TIME magazine and Edventure Partners have joined forces with M2K promotions, a student run advertising company, to sponsor the "TIME UMass Student of the Year" Competition.

This promotion is part of a hands-on internship that 36 UMass students in Dr. Kathleen Debevec's Promotional Strategies class are taking part in with TIME magazine. The main goal of the partnership is to spread awareness of the magazine to students on campus through promotional activities such as the Student of the Year competition.

According to Tarvn Isherwood, a representative for M2K promotions, students will be evaluated on a range of different criteria. One quality that will be looked at is student involvement – both on and off campus. Students will also be evaluated on their aspirations for the future, current G.P.A., current work experiences, and any other additional significant accomplishments that were made during the past two years.

Isherwood explained that nomination papers are available for the Student of the Year contest at M2K's website, www.thinkTIME.net, at the Collegian office, inside the W.E.B. DuBois Library at the circulation desk, and at the M2K promotions table on the Campus Center Concourse. Forms were also distributed to a variety of professors and administrators on campus. In addition, anyone on campus can nominate any student that they think meets the qualifications.

The judging for the competition will be done in rounds. During the first round of competition, students will be judged by the Promotional Strategies class in order to narrow down the group to a selection of finalists. From there, the finalists will be judged by two students on campus, two faculty members, and a representative from the Dean of Students office. The group of judges will be overseen by an editor from TIME magazine in order to determine the winner.

The student who wins the Student of the Year competition will be awarded a $500 scholarship and will be recognized in the Collegian with both an article and an accompaning photograph.

Isherwood said the partnership aims to prove to students that TIME magazine is a magazine for students as well as for the older population.

"TIME cares about students," Isherwood said.

In addition, M2K promotions will also feature a TIME Crossword Puzzle ("The TIME Challenge") in an issue of the Collegian. The questions for the puzzle will be based upon several articles within the "Blair Witch" issue of the magazine that was published on Aug. 16. All correct crossword entries will be entered in a lottery for prizes. The first-prize winner will receive $100, the second-prize winner will get a pair of Boston Bruins tickets, the third-prize winner, a pair of tickets to a Northampton club, and the fourth-prize winner tickets to a performance of Reckless performed by the UMass Theatre Guild.

Any student interested in the Student of the Year competition is urged to pick up an application. All nominations must be received by November 18, no later than 4 p.m. at any location carrying nomination forms.

Tibetan film sponsored

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

As an opening event for Students for a Free Tibet, tonight at 7 p.m. there will be a showing of the film Compassion in Exile in room 1009 on the tenth floor of the Campus Center.

Matt Kozuch, the president of the second-year Registered Student Organization (RSO), described his organization as one that attempts to increase political awareness in the surrounding community about basic human rights issues.

He said the movie was the first event that he personally had helped to organize.

"There was the Tibet Awareness Day, but we just participated in that," Kozuch said. "This is our first event for the year."

The Tibet Awareness Day brought together members of the local Tibetan community, other community supporters of Tibet, and the five colleges. Tonight's movie will bring together some of the 97 members of the Students for a Free Tibet.

Tibet has been occupied by China since 1949. When Tibet was invaded, the Lama was forced to flee to northern India.

Compassion in Exile is, according to Kozuch, an autobiography of the life of the Dalai Lama, and also discusses some of the pertinent issues that surround Tibet today.

"We will have the film, but beforehand there will be food and beverages provided by the People's Market," Kozuch said. "Afterwards, there will be a talk by John Hocevar."

Hocevar is the national president of the Students for a Free Tibet. The organization has an office in New York City, and Hocevar is starting a cross-country speaking tour soon.

Kozuch expects that, among other possible topics, Hocevar will discuss the World Bank and its plan to give $160 million to China. The money will be used to help to transfer some of the population into Tibet, as well as for an expansion of infrastructure.

"That will greatly affect the delicate Tibetan ecosystem," Kozuch said, adding, "and of course it will greatly affect the culture."

This is not the only event for the Students for a Free Tibet. The RSO is currently working with others on campus to organize Human Rights Day for Dec. 10. Kozuch said that he hopes to have a rally on the Amherst Common before marching to Northampton.

"This is going to be a rally for peace and basically a global call for human rights," Kozuch said.

Interfaith dialogue focuses on spirituality

Andrea M. Peers
Collegian Staff

Last night marked the spiritual meeting of three religious icons, who joined in an interfaith dialogue to talk about the different aspects of their religious beliefs. Among the icons, were Pir Vilayat Inayat Khan, the head of the Sufi Order International, Sister Eleanor Dooley, a scholar and professor at Elms College in Chicopee, and Julius Lester, an author and professor of Judaic Studies. All three members were encouraged to discuss their own journey to their faith as well as the importance of interfaith spirituality in today's society.

Lester, who follows Judaism, remembered his vision, which led him to his faith. As a young boy he grew up in a religious household, where he followed his Father's Methodist ways. Lester explained however, that he needed to piece together his faith and his experiences in order to gain knowledge of what was right for him. He explained his vision as a dream, a message.

"In 1981, I had a vision in which I was dancing, and I was a Jew. This experience gave me the divine, and my spiritual journey to Judaism," said Lester.

Sister Dooley also reflected on her journey to Christianity. She referred to a Thomas Merton Book, The Seize of Contemplation, which was the essence of her faith.

"I read this particular line and at that moment I thought, that's really my identity," said Dooley.

Dooley talked about her trips to India and China, which also added to her sense of self being and interfaith. She commented on a brief encounter she had with a Hindu while she was teaching in India.

"I remember one man came up to me and he said I am Hindu and you are Christian, but god is one," Dooley said.

Dooley later said that this taught her that we must all be open to the wealth and richness of the people in the world.

MELINDA NORDSTROM/COLLEGIAN

Sufi leader Pir Vilayat Khan and Chancellor David Scott discuss the role of spirituality within education at the Memorial Hall lecture on Sunday.

Pir Vilayat learned about his true spirituality with his encounters in World War II. Pir Vilayat grew up in France with his father who was a spiritual Guru who offered peace and guidance for people from all around the world. "We were brought up to respect all races and faiths," he added. He gained this strength from these encounters and later joined the war effort with his sister. However, it was his sister's brutal death that sent him on his spiritual journey.

"There was and is still not one moment, one day, or one night, where I am not thinking of my sister's death. I may be laughing, but my heart was crying inside," said Pir Vilayat.

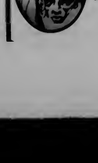
Panel members changed topics, moving to the question of where our spirituality is headed in the future, and what the answer is to interfaith with others of different beliefs. Pir Vilayat gave words of wisdom, suggesting that the pull of the future is in fact stronger than the push of the past. He said that we all create the future with our own vision of how we envision things to be. Pir Vilayat's answer to interfaith was prayer and faith in the figure or beliefs that we hold in worshiping God. He added that faith is another dimension where all people of all religions can be transfigured and feel close to a common belief.

Sister Dooley held similar values, saying that we should move towards a spiritual reawakening in the future. Whatever the religious group may be, we all need to come together on a spiritual level. Dooley also believes the future is directly related to "a greater focus on the privilege of education." She stressed the importance of awareness and the inequalities in life, which often pass us by. She also offered prayer as one of the answers to the future of spirituality.

"God does speak to the human heart. We need to help people draw the strength that is within them," said Dooley.

Lester took a slightly different spin on interfaith connections, however, stating that in order to make the world better, we must be conscience of the evil we add to the world and the evil we do unto others. He offered words of advice from the great Dr. Martin Luther King and the civil rights movement, saying that we "add evil to the world if we are not aware of our own consciousness and the evil in ourselves."

All three speakers ended with final thoughts, suggesting that if people are brought up to hate and learn to hate, then they can also learn to love. We will all be successful and effective in our lives if we have the presence of our god or belief in our life, according to Dooley. Every crisis signifies a breakdown, yet with that breakdown comes a breakthrough. Pir Vilayat perhaps defined the importance of interfaith togetherness with his analogy of a simple game.



"The world is like a giant crossword puzzle. All the pieces are askew, but they are all meant to fit together in one way or another," said Pir Vilayat.

Israeli bombings injure 27 as peace talks begin

By Lee Hockstader
Washington Post

NETANYA, Israel – Three pipe bombs exploded simultaneously at a bustling intersection in Netanya, Israel, yesterday, injuring 27 people and souring the mood a day before the start of intensive negotiations to reach a comprehensive Middle East peace agreement.

Israeli police blamed Islamic militants for the attack and arrested two Palestinians on suspicion of planting the bombs. Authorities found and destroyed a fourth, unexploded bomb in the vicinity.

The bombing fit a pattern of attacks by Islamic extremists timed to undercut progress, or the possibility of progress, here. Israeli and Palestinian representatives are scheduled to begin intensive talks today to resolve the toughest issues that divide them, with the goal of drafting a framework agreement for a permanent peace deal by mid-February, and a final treaty by next fall.

Israeli security officials have been warning for weeks that new terror attacks could coincide with intensified peace talks. Over the weekend, the Islamic Resistance Movement, Hamas, warned it would escalate attacks against Israel, but the group made no claim of responsibility for yesterday's incident. Hamas sees the peace process as a sellout of Palestinian interests.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak condemned the bombing, but made it clear there would be no postponement in the peace talks. "This government is determined not to yield to any kind of terror and to crack the terror activities in this country, whether from within or from without," he told reporters.

Yasser Abed Rabbo, chief Palestinian negotiator for the talks starting Monday, also criticized the attack, which he said "harms the atmosphere as we prepare to begin final status negotiations."

The bombs, packed with nails, planted in a trash can, and apparently detonated by a timer, were not very powerful. A handful of the victims required surgery, but most of the injuries were light to moderate. There was little damage to adjacent stores.

But the bombs were clearly intended to cause maximum possible harm to civilians in this scruffy coastal town north of Tel Aviv. The bombs exploded in Netanya's busiest commercial neighborhood at 10:30 a.m., the height of the midmorning shopping rush on the first business day of the week in Israel.

"There was a loud boom, and then one man was scrambling on the streets on his hands, with his leg mangled," said Shemyan Masoud, who owns a clothing store across the street from the bomb site. "Just as it happened, my wife was right here with me with my two babies, and I, a 35-year-old man, cried like a 12 year-old boy."

Shortly after the explosion television crews fanned out on the scene and a few dozen right wing Israelis demonstrated. They chanted "Death to the Arabs!" and denounced Barak's policy.

"The way Barak talk- gives them the impression this is okay," said Yehoshua Yarsh, 53, a diamond cutter. "The Arabs don't honor any of the agreements, but Barak goes and gives."

A middle-aged woman [illegible] to this exploded in rage. "We have to [illegible] the Arabs," she yelled. "Not eat, drink, an I by bombs! Our nation is retarded!"

The government has recently made a series of moves to build confidence with the Palestinians and revive the long-stalled peace process. Since Barak took office in July, he has released some 350 Palestinian so-called security prisoners from Israeli jails, opened a safe passage route for Palestinians to cross Israel between the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and withdrawn Israeli troops from a chunk of West Bank land.

He is poised to hand over more West Bank territory to Palestinian control next week, in compliance with an interim peace deal signed two months ago.

finally, in '89 the death of six Jesuits and their housekeeper and daughter – all well-known atrocities," Tiffany said. "Salvadorans that were murdered at the hand of graduates of the School of the Americas."

Tiffany said the 1993 United Nations Truth Commission found two-thirds of the officers responsible for the atrocities committed during the civil war were graduates of the SOA. Since the publication of the Truth Commission, reports from Columbia, Guatemala, Peru, Chile, and Mexico have come in citing the terror and killing activities of the SOA.

"The evidence has become overwhelming and certainly irrefutable," Tiffany said.

Tiffany and Kinane showed a video produced by the United States government. They said they had received the video from an SOA proponent at a rally. Tiffany said every congressman had received a copy of the video.

The video described the SOA as necessary to promote democracy, human rights and professionalism in soldiers, and to fight the war on drugs and stop communism. Images of children being helped by medics trained at the SOA were placed next to grainy, black-and-white shots of Chinese communist troops, Fidel Castro, and color footage of drug raids. These images were followed by pro-SOA statements by former ambassador to the United Nations Jeane Kirkpatrick, a professor from Yale University, and Senator Sam Nunn.

Throughout the screening, students jeered the video.

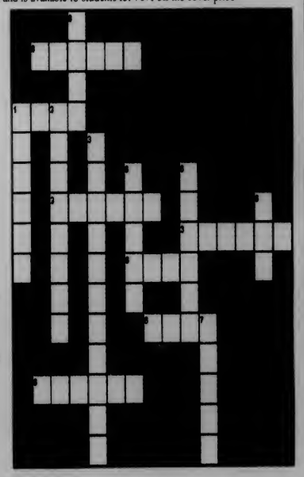
The campaign to close the SOA began with the founding of a group called SOA Watch by Father Roy Bourgeouis, according to Kinane. The group campaigns by lobbying Congress and protesting publicly.

In 1995, the first protest by 25 people was held at Fort Benning. The protest resulted in ten arrests. Kinane said the activists discovered that those who had gone to prison could attract support and attention. They began taking advantage of the extra attention in order to promote their cause, resulting in an increase of protesters each year. In a 1998 protest, 2,319 people chose to walk on to Fort Benning and risk being arrested. This protest was the largest civil disobedience action in the United States since the Vietnam War.

Kinane and Tiffany also showed the video Crossing the Line, which documents the 1998 protest and procession on to Fort Benning.

In the open dialogue following the video, an audience member said both videos were propaganda, and asked if the campaign against SOA was with the United States military overall. The rest of the audience responded very harshly against the U.S. military. Some said the military should not cross U.S. borders, and that the military was doing so to protect U.S. economic interests.

Kinane said the SOA has "contempt for local and national law," and is "subversive to democracy."



"SOA does our dirty work," Kinane said.

Memoirs of an Underachiever

Well, the midpoint of the semester has arrived. This is excellent news for some students. Their struggles are almost over. All their hard work has come to fruition, and they are reaping the rewards of their struggles. For the rest of us, the mid-semester mark serves as a wake-up call. It has become blatantly obvious that apathy will result in failure. The alarms are ringing, and something needs to be done. Will we be able to catch up? Have our grades suffered too much?

It's at this time that I ask myself, why am I so inept? Why am I headed for another disappointing report card? Everyone knows that I procrastinate. I probably enjoy myself a bit more than I should. But negligence is not the entirety of my problem. My true foible is a lack of preparation.

William F. Larkin

There are nights when I do my work diligently, but they are few and far between. Indeed, I am more apt to watch a movie after class than to read a book. Distractions are everywhere within the halls of a college dormitory. All too often my work takes a back seat to more appealing endeavors. But because of this, I am hardly ever prepared for lectures, and rarely am I responsive in discussions.

What is this lack of preparedness that I speak of? It is a wicked beast, complete with razor-sharp claws and serrated teeth. This monster forms a symbiotic relationship with its unknowing host, seizing his motives and directing his actions. These victims are easily discernable amongst the student body. They come to class not having done any homework. They also oversleep, missing class entirely. And some students, seized by the titillation of merriment, simply skip class. Regardless of the means, the end is the same: the students do not learn anything. The claws of apathy rake their skin; its teeth gnaw upon their bones.

So how can we slay this wretched fiend? Has it any weakness? Will no champion combat its evils? I cannot answer these questions for sure; each student must choose their own path. But I do know of a weapon with which one can battle this malignancy. What is this divine armament, you ask? The answer is simple - it is the schedule. One cannot hope to depose a lack of preparedness, for it is invincible. But with a good schedule by his side, one has a good chance of moving around it.

So, without further ado, here are the four tenets of the perfect schedule:

Never schedule class on Friday. For the most part, the classes scheduled on Fridays are discussions, and we know how educational those can be. Sorry to say, these classes are useless. For my part, I have not once gained the slightest enlightenment from actively participating in the "discussions" that occur. These "discussions" are little more than the semi-sober ramblings of college students eager to start the weekend. Hardly ever are new topics covered; there is little new to learn. In some classes, however, new material is in fact covered, but this material is irrelevant. It is not part of the syllabus, and it is not part of the all-important examination. Yes, I am here for more than grades, I am here to learn. But in this grade-intensive college atmosphere, I must dine with the wretches at the table of necessity.

Make Monday your lightest workload; make Thursday your greatest workload. Let us consider the typical college weekend, whether it is spent here or at some other university. We are not uniquely contemptible. Across the country, Fridays and Saturdays are dedicated to festivity. Sundays are generally spent recovering from the frivolity of the previous two days. Some homework can be done on a Sunday night, but for the most part, I spend Sundays relaxing. I probably start reading or writing around midnight, but are a few hours sufficient to complete a weekend's worth of homework? The answer is all too often unfavorable.

Most people would agree that Mondays are the worst day of the week. Not only is the weekend excitement but a memory, but also the forgotten horrors of work are again sudden and harsh. This injury is difficult enough on its own. One would do well to avoid making the pain any worse. This way, more work can be piled on the shoulders of the student as the week builds. The student will become more pliable each day. After Thursday, all the warmth of merriment awaits.

Schedule your most important classes earlier in the day. Now this is not to say that you have to schedule your classes early in the day. It is a given that one should schedule all their classes as late as possible. Yes, it is good to wake up early in the morning. If you know the dining halls, then you are well aware of the fact that breakfast is the only edible meal of the day. However, an early start is not always possible. Not a single student graduates from this university without having to stay up late working or studying at least once in their academic tenure at the University of Massachusetts.

There is a popular notion that one does his or her best work at the beginning of the day, that one's mind works best immediately after sleep. While I do not support this claim, I do acknowledge the possibility of its truth. Let me ask you this, would you rather miss a more important class or a less important class? Everyone knows that waking up is a very difficult thing to do - perhaps one of the most difficult, considering the college environment. I loathe waking up; it is a wretched task indeed. All too often, I sleep in and skip my first class. I feel that I would be more motivated to wake myself and go to class, were that class to be important.

I skip the final class of the day all too often. It is rather easy to go to dinner early than to walk across campus in the rain, especially just so that I can attend some banal lecture. Personally, I would feel more compelled to quell my hunger and brave the elements for an important class.

I save as little time between classes as possible. Idleness is a very dangerous and chaotic state, especially in a dormitory. That is when frivolity gleans its seductive shoulder. To sit in a dorm without chore is the death knell of the lazy. It is inevitable that one will not stay idle for long. The problem is that the student will find something enjoyable to fill his hours. He will not do work. At times, these enjoyable activities become too engaging. Unfortunately, class is easily forgotten about.

Also, when a student is aware that on the following day he will be free for a significant amount of time, there is a tendency to postpone homework until the next day. Even if one were to complete the pending assignment during his down time, it would most likely appear hurried. But even this likelihood is a dim possibility. To attend class not having done the expected homework is tantamount to skipping the class altogether. It is better to ignore the down time of the following day. This way the homework must be done on the previous night.

Understand, I have not written this guide to help those who are genuinely uninterested in the scholarly pursuit. I write to those who want to make a change for the better, for I believe most college students are interested in the pursuit of knowledge. It is knowledge that empowers, and it is this power that unlocks all the doors of fulfillment. I for one do not plan to let happenstance stand in the way of my opportunity. I want to succeed. I want my parents to be proud of their investment. I want to be prepared.

Parking wars

Mark Shea

Well, they finally got me. I tip my hat to the fine men and women over in Parking Services. They run a tight ship over there, and, sooner or later, they always get their man.

This semester, I have been driving my roommate's car to campus more often than I have in the past, and I must say that I enjoy it immensely. There's nothing quite like standing on a crowded bus in midday North Pleasant St. traffic while some fool tries to figure out how to attach his bike to the front rack to make you really appreciate the wasteful and unnecessary consumption of fossil fuels.

But driving to campus isn't all smiles and feelings of superiority over pedestrians. My roommate's rust-colored Buick Regal comes chained to Parking Services in some sort of unholy marriage (I have changed the make of the car to protect my roommate, who still battles Parking Services and vows he will retreat into the hills and wage guerrilla warfare rather than park legally).

Now, I admit that I understand the importance of regulated parking on campus. Without restricted lots and parking meters, campus would be even more congested than it already is. There would be no parking for the good people who feed us, clean up our messes, and shovel the snow. Still more importantly, there would be no more parking for the people who are in charge of overcrowding the dorms and losing our financial aid forms. I understand that campus would be reduced to howling chaos if every single commuter student tried to cram his car into the limited space available. I understand and I can accept it. I can even accept the $1.25 it costs to park at a meter for the duration of one class. But I cannot accept the green stickers they have pasted on all the meters. Are you familiar with these stickers?

Essentially, they say that if a meter is broken, you cannot park in that spot. They helpfully advise you to find another spot and to report the broken meter by calling the number that is conveniently provided. They do not suggest what you should do if this is the only spot in a two-mile radius, or what to do if you dumped your last six quarters into the thing before you realized it was broken. These stickers drive me right out of my freakin' mind. They tell me that the University would rather see that spot empty and useless rather than lose out on the pittance which it would earn over the course of a day. It is a barely significant yet unmistakable sign of the lack of compassion and spirit of unmitigated greed which this otherwise fine institution can sometimes exhibit.

In that green sticker I see every DC meal which I had to pay for but never ate, every cent I had to waste on that damn library cupcard thing, and every Mountain Dew I wanted but couldn't have because I go to a "Coca-Cola brand" university. I saw all that as I looked at the green sticker and I said, "No More!" I began to fight back.

And I fought them successfully all September. First in the Totman parking lot, where I spurned the paltry row of meters and went straight for the reserved spaces. I moved deeper into campus, playing games of cat-and-mouse in the red lots by Dickinson, running back to move the car in between each class. And whatever I did, they couldn't catch me. I'm not saying there weren't some close calls; there were a few times when I got out just as The Man was coming down my row, checking stickers. And I'll never forget that damp, gray, fall morning when they tried to block my roommate in his illegal space so they could ticket him, and only his bold and daring skill behind the wheel saved him. I don't like to throw words like "hero" around all that often, but what else can you say about a man like that?

Of course my success made me overconfident, and, like Icarus, I flew too close to the sun (Whitmore) on my wings of melting wax (roommate's Buick). Late for an exam in Herter, I decided to try my luck in the ling me, mucking me. My face burned with shame as I drove home to tell my roommate that his once pristine, albeit rusty, car had been sullied by the unclean hand of Parking Services.

Call me a coward, call me a cheapskate, but one massive parking ticket is enough for me. I quit. You win, Parking Services, you and your green stickers and yellow envelopes. I'm back to freezing at the bus stop and waking up early to get to class on time. My dreams of free parking are no more. But. . .

My roommate is still out there, driving his rusty Buick. And what about all the other roommates and all the other rusty Buicks out there - can you stop them all? I think not, Parking Services.

I think not.

Sticks and stones

Why the * can't I say *? It's just a *n' word. Any  knows a swear can't physically hurt a person. Lots of people try to tell me that swearing is crude, and I'll agree, I do think swearing is crude. However, were swears always looked on as bad? Where down the line did someone decide that these words should be outcast from public speaking?

Jason Csernich

Most swears describe acts, things, or parts of the anatomy that are usually censored. Did they always describe the unmentionable? I think it was a matter of a select group of white guys from colonial times trying to describe what was best for us.

Big Wig #1: Okay, that settles it. We have just introduced black licorice to the world. Now onto our next issue: certain four-letter words I don't like. I don't like these four letter words. Percival, I detest their sound. They make my powdered wig stand on end. What can we do with these words?

Big Wig #2: Let's hide them, Thomas. If we don't use them, and we turn our nose up at those who do, we can give them a bad reputation.

Big Wig #3: Ooo. Ooo. Better yet, let's only use these words in fits of vulgar rage such as when we're thrown from our horses. If we do that, then it will be associated with bad things. We can even go so far as to label dirty things with these four letter words.

Big Wigs #1 and #2: SMASHING!

Big Wig #1: Now our remaining issue, I propose that we force people to prefer sports over the arts. . .

Who are these people who are so violently offended by these solitary words? More accurately, who are these people who go so out of their way to make sure you don't hear, speak, or even (gasp) see these words in print? Censors of course. These people are usually politicians or parents.

Politicians jump on the issue of censorship because it's easy to hide behind. They realize it is the perfect scapegoat. It can get them support from areas they previously lack in, and it takes a lot less effort to tackle than a real issue such as homelessness or hunger. When crude behavior is orchestrated by the youth in this country, the theory adopted by politicians is "The media is to blame." Do they think that swears and other crude behavior have been around only as long as R-rated films have? I would like to challenge this theory with evidence of swearing from before the age of film, but chances are that's been censored by the politicians too.

Almost all our parents have torn into us at least once in our lives for swearing. They blame it on what we read and view. The ironic truth is we learn it from them. A parent slams his finger in a car door and yells an expletive in front of his young child who is sitting in the passenger seat. It is 1.2 seconds long. From the belly, up the throat, off the tongue, nothing but swear. The parent can't take it back. Like it or not, the child heard it, and it is firmly implanted in the child's memory. It was probably too sharp and too loud to ignore. No amount of soap or other absurd and sadistic punishment will make the child not repeat the word they have just learned. That parent didn't learn the swear from a movie or record album. Nope, he learned it from his parents! His parents learned it from their own parents, and so on and so on back through the ages. Parents reading this article may argue that swears can be taught to children by their peers. That is true, but guess what? Your children's peers have parents too. That's where they learned how to swear.

Swearing has been around a long time, and will be around for a long time to come. I'm not saying we should swear all the time in everyday life. If we did that we certainly would offend some people. You may not be offended by a swear, but chances are the person next to you could. As long as personal taste exists in this world, there will probably never be a public and vast commonplace for swears in this world. I still just have to wonder, why are people so offended by them? They do have vulgar meanings but they still are just words. Think about it.

Strife in Sierra Leone

While reading through last September 13ths Time magazine, I glanced over an article concerning a West African country that has come under hard times recently. I really enjoy learning anything and everything that I can about the continent of Africa. This place of wonder and awe has always perplexed me in different ways. I really hope to someday visit, for an extended period of time, places like The Gambia, Ivory Coast, Guinea-Bissau, and Burkina Faso. The West African country in question is called Sierra Leone, and it is a French-speaking country that has been in an ugly civil war lately.

Sierra Leone is a country that has settled into an uneasy peace as of late. There has been an eight-year civil war that has divided this country and scarred the lives of thousands of natives. This war has managed to turn friends into enemies, and has made neighbors turn on each other. Human-rights groups estimate that thousands of civilians have been maimed by rebel soldiers. You see, these bastard rebel soldiers would go into rural villages and amputate the limbs of innocent civilians just to instill fear in the hearts of the natives. In this Time magazine article that I read, a 13-year-old girl named Issatu Kargbo, who lives with her family in a shack near the capital of Freetown, detailed the story of when the rebels came into her home. Rebels barged in around four in the afternoon. A soldier picked out six of Issatu's family members and took them back to their base camp. There was a fire outside, and these rebel soldiers were pushing passersby into it. They made people lie in the fire while they stood on them. That is horrible, and I cannot for the life of me imagine the pain that those people endured. The girl, Issatu, went on to say that throughout this melee, the rebels were laughing and joking, a sick testament to their demented way of life. The next part of her story was even more gruesome. The rebels cut the arms or hands off the remaining detainees. The adults of the family were begging for their lives, and the children were crying from the ordeal of watching their loved ones go through the immense physical pain of having their limbs severed. The rebels forced Issatu on the ground, and cut her hands off quickly. She said that she didn't feel any pain initially, but then it became dark outside, and she passed out on the ground. She managed to regain consciousness, and crawl to another place of refuge and then pass out again. She walked back to the shack and her aunt started crying, but the rebels told her that if she were to cry anymore they would shoot her point blank.

Issatu used to play with her friends and younger sisters, chasing them and wrestling with them. She can no longer enjoy some of the things you or I take granted for in life. She needs help doing some of the most basic and simple things in life like eating, gesticulating, or even scratching herself. This fact of her life has been taken away all because the rebels wanted to instill fear and intimidation in the eyes of the natives. This is one of the most horrendous acts I have ever read of.

Another story in this article I came across that was harrowing and disconsolate is one that happened to Abdul Sankoh, a 27-year-old teacher until the government and rebel forces closed his school. His ordeal started while he was picking mangoes in a field.

The rebels came, seized him, and brought him to a village where 36 other rebels were holding five others captive. Eventually Abdul was ordered to the ground, and his right hand was chopped off. He went on to say that the amputations were the most painful things he had ever encountered, and that he wished that pain on no person. Abdul's lips were also cut off because he was shouting in anguish after his left hand was severed. After losing consciousness, he walked back to his village and received medical attention. Now he is a jobless amputee who lives in a center for handicaps in Freetown.

It was hard to read the article because it is difficult to imagine the mental and physical pain that these people in Sierra Leone underwent during this period of civil unrest. Imagine that unknown strangers barge into your home, take your brother or sister prisoner, and take one of their limbs off right in front of your face. You have no way of helping them, all you can do is listen to their screams of bitter pain while being physically forced to watch the torture.

I just wanted to raise an issue in the arena of world news that maybe you haven't heard of. It is truly sickening and gut-wrenching, but it is all true, and that is the scary part.

Extreme culture at ESCA

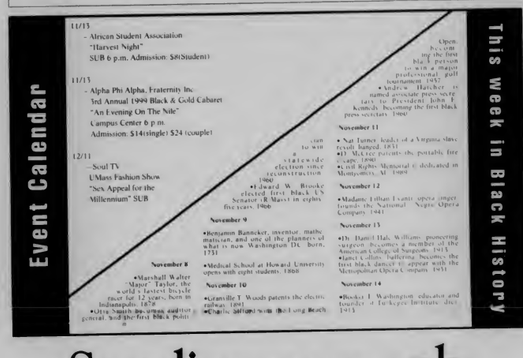
By Lisa Green
Collegian Correspondent

As I strolled into the Malcom X Cultural Center, I immediately thought, where should I put my equipment? Should I strategically place the lights on the right to properly illuminate the talent? Should the tripod be placed in the center of the room? Or should I make the camera mobile? These are the questions that flooded my mind. Who am I? I am Lisa Green, the director and producer of Soul TV. On this night, ESCA is the event, while culture is the objective.

The English Speaking Caribbean Association, known as ESCA, celebrated their First Annual Talent Showcase which took place on Thursday, November 3, 1999, at the Malcom X Cultural Center. President of ESCA Hugh Reid, along with his executive board, have an abundance of projects lined up for the new RSO, which was just established this semester. A few of the events ESCA is planning are: "A Taste of the Tropics," "The Carib Festiva," and the "West Indian Bash 2000" which is in collaboration with RSO Soul TV.

This cultural showcase featured a wide array of talents throughout the University of Massachusetts. Some of these very gifted groups included dances by Unique and the Funk Club, sultry songs by Premium, Ianelle Butler, a junior on campus, Patricia Cesaire from Boundaries, free-styling by John Faye and "Extravaganza" the Extravagant One, poetry by Soul TV's own Althea Holford entitled "A Thief in the Night," Howard Webley with his rendition of "Love, West Indian Style," and Jeff with his "Banana Shake." The talent portion was concluded by the ESCA dancers. Afterwards, many stayed at the 'X', to enjoy the music of calypso and soca.

This atmosphere facilitated a high level of pride among the UMass students present. "I'm one hundred percent Bajan, born and bred," states Corey McCarthy, a senior. "It's nice to see calypso playing besides all reggae and hip-hop." The President of ESCA, Hugh Reid comments, "I think tonight was a huge success. For the first time we had all West Indians. English-speaking, Spanish-speaking, French-speaking West Indians came together and showed that the English Speaking Caribbean Students Association is not about separation, but about unity and the future."



If you want to catch a glimpse of the ESCA talent showcase, watch Soul TV on UVC- channel 19 this Tuesday and Thursday at 9 p.m. Soul TV's motto is "Experience Extreme Culture." Decide for yourself whether ESCA displays a successful derivation of this motto.

Graffiti has long been considered vandalism and a nuisance to society. Over the past two decades, it has become accepted as a way for urban youth to express themselves. It acts as a vent for an artist to decorate the city, mark his or her "territory," and show fearlessness. It is most definitely an art that has risen from urban culture, which has grown to be more mainstream.

Many talents shows promise but cannot deliver. This, however, was not the case at the English Speaking Caribbean Association's (ESCA) 1st Annual ESCA Talent Showcase on Thursday, November 4th. This talent showcase was held at the Malcolm X Cultural Center where the place was packed, and the crowd was hyped. The officers of ESCA include Hugh Reid as president, Alexsia Harrison, vice-president, Saran Vaughn as secretary, and Althea Holford as treasurer. "This seems to be exactly what the minority community of UMass needed to reunite itself," said Saran Vaughn.

The talent showcase opened with the Black National Anthem sung by Ianelle Butler. Her soft, sultry voice filled the room, as brothers and sisters bowed their heads in reverence. The next act was one of the highlights of the showcase - ESCA dancers Faiza Bodden and Hugh Reid. Their Caribbean rhythms dance was filled with excitement. They both donned white and silver outfits under black lights that made their dance electric. Sending their love to the crowd were Premium, consisting of April Andrews, Ruth Charlemagne, and Tanya Allen, who sang their rendition of "Sending My Love to You" by Zhane. The strength and sexiness of their voices flowed.

Bringing the show together, as hostesses usually do, was Vivian Onuoha. When asked what she thought of the turnout, and about the show in general, Onuoha stated, "I'm just really happy to see the unity between the English speaking Caribbean Islanders. They are so underrepresented on this campus. It is nice to see them get together."

"One of the best crowds I've ever seen at UMass," said Monica Chierici, who had to sit on the floor because it was so packed.

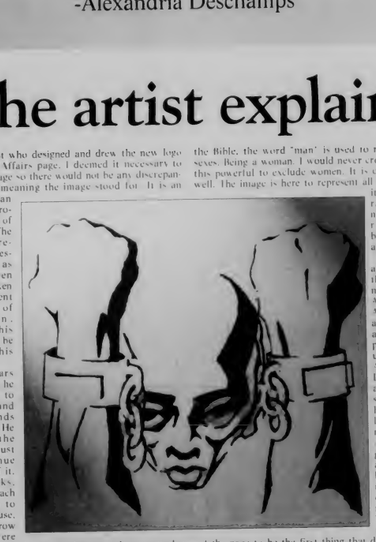
Despite the stereotype of riots breaking out every time a large group of minorities get together, the crowd here was unbelievable. They were just out there to support their community.

"I think that every act was received very well," said Shauna Rigaud, an ESCA dancer.

"The crowd was very supportive," said Tony Ortega, "was kind of nervous, because [he's] new on campus, but [he] felt supported." He went on to say that "[he] usually does not see the diversity on caupus, but [he] felt as though the ESCA talent showcase was a good learning experience for everyone involved."

The most anticipated performance of the night was the last one, by more of the ESCA dancers. "After that first dance, I cannot wait to see what else they come up with," said Amora Maso-Perez.

The dancers shocked everyone with the use of their countries' flags. It was spectacular and creative. The dance, choreographed by Hugh Reid, was motivating and left the crowd enthused and stimulated. "I wanted to get up and represent my heritage. It made me proud to see not only my heritage, but my friends' heritages celebrated in such a colorful way," said Kristen Moore. Moore maintained, "I am waiting for another one."



Another big surprise of the night was the new disc jockey on the scene, Compton Webster, a Guyanese native, UMass student, and middle linebacker for the Minutemen, was featured behind the DJ table for the night. He was spinning the latest and hottest reggae, calypso, and soca records. Webster stated, "I've been waiting a long time to be recognized on the UMass DJ scene. There aren't too many DJs out there playing reggae, soca, and calypso. I'm just trying to make a name for myself."

Also behind the DJ table was D.J. Big Phil, who performs at the Malcolm X Cultural Center on a regular basis.

For those who missed it, the ESCA dancers will be performing four times this weekend. They will be dancing at the African Student Association's "Harvest Night" in the Student Union Ballroom. They will also be performing at the 3rd Annual 1999 Black & Gold Cabaret entitled "An Evening On The Nile" which is in the Campus Center.

The artist explains

As the artist who designed and drew the new logo for the Black Affairs page, I deemed it necessary to explain the image so there would not be any discrepancies with the meaning the image stood for. It is an image of a man that has just broken the chains of his shackles. The shackles represent the oppression that we as blacks feel even now. The broken chains represent the evils of oppression, which at this moment is to be broken by this generation.

He appears angry because he is now ready to take charge and make demands for his future. He is tired of the oppression just as we continue to be tired of it. We, as blacks, have yet to reach a resolution to slavery, to abuse, and to Jim Crow laws which were only done away with a generation ago when my mother was still young, but old enough to remember.

A man was not specifically chosen to exclude women by any means. I am a woman. I chose this image to represent blacks as a people, not as a sex. Even in the Bible, the word "man" is used to represent both sexes. Being a woman, I would never create something this powerful to exclude women. It is our struggle as well. The image is here to represent all blacks, not just a few. The image is here to represent all black appearance, rather by its meaning. It represents blacks as men and women.

We must also understand that black does not only mean African American. It also refers to all of those people that fall under the African Diaspora. We all have the same fight. We have been here longer than many of the AIANA groups yet we are the last to be accepted. It is time to take charge and move ahead. The image is not at the top of the page to be the first thing that demeans us. The image is at the top to motivate and empower us to greater heights.

-La'Tasha Green

If ignorance is your bliss, let silence be your virtue

By Hugh Reid
Collegian Staff

There have been times in which people have asked, "why is there a need for these pages anyway?" Well, I am going to let you all know. For too long we have been taught history as they see it. For too long we have been forced to read little or nothing about us. Finally, we get an opportunity to gain mobility as a people, and report our events in our own words, by our own people. There is that voice out there trying to hold us down, pull us back, and destroy us.

The purpose of the Black Affairs page is to highlight the events and pertinent information that involve black people, not just African Americans, on campus and around the world. We as a college paper do have an obligation to present information that is directly related to the campus, i.e. events, teachers, students, etc. What happens in this state, country, and around the world to black people is pertinent to the development of black awareness and identity. To limit a page, such as mine, GLBT Issues, Jewish Affairs, or Multi Cultural Affairs in order to solely talk about things that happen on the university's campus would not only be an injustice to students on campus, but also to the institution and educated people call the media.

The Black Affairs page is read by basically everyone. Black, white, Asian, Native American... You name it, they read it. It does focus on the black community. However it is targeted for everyone who reads it (not skims it, but reads it) to learn and broaden their horizons. This page gives everyone a better idea as to what is going on in the lives of black people.

This may come as a shock to those of you who are still living in a box, but the Black Affairs page does not, and has never, solely catered to one specific racial section of campus. This is a legitimate publication, and we present the news. Now, I know that there are some people out there who remember the Black Affairs page of old. But if some of you want to see personals, comics, or mindless fillers, you're going to need to go back to your high school. This is college and it's a different world. Besides, I don't play those games.

With respect to the logo, I was going to go off and blow up some spots, however, I decided to be a professional and save some of you out there the embarrassment that would follow. Instead, I will refrain, and break it down for you all in four points. You might want a back brace because this is heavy.

(1) I decided to make La'Tasha Green's artwork into the Black Affairs logo because it represented all of the ideals of our ancestors, to me, and to the rest of the intellectual community. It represents the strength, power, determination, perseverance, trials, tribulations, success, achievements, dedications, love, struggles, anger, and dominance - something that some of you complainers have obviously never experienced.

(2) The logo reveals the secrets of freedom, exemplified by the broken chain. Maybe those of you who missed that little tidbit should take a closer look at her artwork. This freedom gives us a sense of uplifted pride that, again, some of you complainers have obviously never experienced, and never will experience.

(3) The logo is an image of a man, deal with it. Sometimes in life we don't get what we want. I cannot, and refuse to try to figure out why this is an issue, but my advice is to seek professional help and stop making little things like the gender of a drawing a factor. The truth is that in reality the drawing symbolizes the plight of a people not of a black man and not a black woman. If La'Tasha wanted a woman, she would have drawn a woman.

(4) Lastly, why does it matter whether or not the person is bald? This is a frivolous attempt to find something wrong with the page. Would you all prefer that she gave him an 'Afro, a Geri-curl, some buck shots, or even some "fi"a" naps? Let's be honest. Would it have made the artwork any stronger? Get real!

I would like to dedicate this last paragraph to all of those people out there that find it necessary to complain, whine, moan, and snicker about the progress of the page. It's artwork. The fact is that for the first time in their lives, they are being educated and not just wasting their parents' money. The fact is that when they left their parents' protective nest, they were going to experience blackness on the next level. It is true that "nothing is said that has not been said before." Therefore, if ignorance is your bliss, let silence be your virtue. The point I am trying to make is that McDonald's is still hiring, and if you are not willing to be educated, you should stop wasting time and do something that requires less brainpower.

New movies dominate weekend's box office

This week, three new openers hit the box office and almost managed a sweep, taking three of the top four spots overall.

The drama suspense movie The Bone Collector, starring Denzel Washington and emerging "it" girl Angelina Jolie, took the top spot this weekend with $17.2 million. The film, which also opened on the largest number of screens (2589) averaged a fairly impressive (for a wide open) $6643 per-screen average.

Close behind in screen count, but not in interest, with 2533 screens, was Chris O'Donnell's latest fiasco, The Bachelor.

The romantic comedy, which also stars Renee Zellweger, drew $8 million worth of business, giving it a $3172 per-screen average.

House on Haunted Hill, last week's scary flick of the moment and undeserving box office champ, fell to third place this week with $7.8 million. That's an ahs-mal, but expected, 51 percent drop for the Warner Brothers release. "Damn that's scary, so."

The final opener this weekend was the docudrama The Insider, starring Al Pacino as the producer of the popular TV news magazine program "60 Minutes." The film, which opened on only 1809 screens, appealed to an older audience, a.k.a. CBS' regular viewing audience. Still, its $3870 per-screen average was good enough for a $7 million dollar weekend and fourth place.

The Tommy Lee Jones, Ashley Judd, Harrison Ford (oh no, wait he's not in this one) action movie Double Jeopardy continues to perform much better than expected at the box office. The movie lost only 17 percent of last week's business, and grossed $4.5 million this weekend. That puts its total at $104.5 million overall.

The Best Man also continued its steady box office march this past session with $4.3 million. That 32 percent drop is actually slighter better than last week, which means this movie is holding up nicely.

Unfortunately, something will have to give when the targeted demographic gets another movie Wednesday with Light it Up.

American Beauty continues to ride a huge word-of-mouth campaign to box office success. The movie lost virtually no business, falling only 13 percent from last week to earn $3.3 million for the weekend. Its cumulative total stands at $58.9 million, so $100 million might be a stretch at this point, unless it can last until Oscar nominations.

I'm not sure how much I can say about this next movie to make people understand its true magnitude. The Sixth Sense, after almost five months of release, remains in the top ten at number eight this week. It lost 0 percent from last week. That's right. It

Washington, Jolie carry Bone

The Bone Collector
Directed by Phillip Noyce with Denzel Washington, Angelina Jolie
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

Hollywood spends most of its time cramming formulas down our throats, adding whatever cosmetics are necessary to let us forget that we've already seen a dozen other versions of the movie in front of us. They can dress up a formula with the best acting, directing, and writing they can find, but the core of such a movie will always be recycled material. This brings us to The Bone Collector, a crime thriller which plays out like nearly every other crime thriller, but which displays enough talent to hold our attention for two hours. Don't expect anything mind-shattering, but if you're in the mood for a solid hunt-down-the-killer movie, The Bone Collector may be worth your while.

Denzel Washington, not surprisingly, gives a wonderful performance as Lincoln Rhymes, a cop paralyzed four years ago in a freak accident, and now contemplating assisted suicide. Denzel is charming, serious, humorous in turns, and above all sincere. Angelina Jolie performs equally well as Amelia Donaghy, a novice cop who becomes involved with helping Lincoln track down a serial murderer. The excellent acting by both Denzel and Angelina is primarily to thank for pulling the movie above the sea of look-alikes from which it borrows nearly all of its material.

The movie, it seems, recognizes this strength and spends much of its time sculpting the two main characters into compelling, captivating people; the initial tension, and later the growing emotional rapport between Lincoln and Amelia, is given as much treatment as the hunt for the serial killer. This poses problems for the crime thriller aspect of the movie, however, and after all of the personal struggles the characters wade through in hunting down the killer, the ending feels limp, almost an afterthought. Ultimately, this isn't so much a movie about a serial killer as it is a movie about tracking down a serial killer, about the inner hurdles these two characters must leap before being able to properly perform their job.

The acting and character complexity take a serious turn for the worse, however, with most of the supporting cast. Ed O'Neill (Al from TV's "Married With Children") and Queen Latifah do their best with their shallow, almost entirely useless roles. Of particular note is Capt. Howard Cheney (Michael Rooker), one of the most stereotypically overbearing, bull-headed, meddling police captains ever seen in a movie. Rooker's character is like a bad joke you've heard a dozen times, and every time he walks into the scene, the movie's credibility is immediately knocked down a few notches.

The movie ends with an unfulfilling encounter with the killer, and some heart-warming, if entirely predictable, character development so fans of more psychologically intense crime thrillers like Silence of the Lambs or Seven may walk away disappointed. The Bone Collector does have its share of well-handled grotesqueness, and many scenes and locations exude suspense and a chilling sense of the unknown, thanks to Noyce's solid directorial efforts. Better serial killer movies have been made, certainly, but The Bone Collector offers enough suspense and character depth to make it worth your time. B-

Crowe, Pacino boost powerful The Insider

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

Perhaps the first look at The Insider is deceiving, but then again, nothing is quite as it seems in this film. The Insider is the latest movie in the current trend of media bashing (its own kind (see also The Truman Show, Three Kings, and even American Beauty). Unlike these other films though, in which the perception of the media as money hungry propagandists selling unhealthy messages to the public is implicit, The Insider takes literally you inside the workings of a media giant.

Fortunately, the picture is not all that bad. We encounter Lowell Bergman, a journalist of high reputation and moreover a man of integrity, who is the producer of "60 Minutes." Courtesy of Christopher Plummer, we get great insight into Mike Wallace, weathered journalist fifty-five years in the making and respected host of the aforementioned news program. This is not a world of corruption or even capitalism, this is a professional media organization going after the best news story, and for once they're working in the public interest.

The conflict of the movie arises when Bergman (Al Pacino) consults healthcare specialist and resident genius Jeffrey Wigand (Russell Crowe) about inside documents from Phillip Morris. Wigand is a family man, and though reluctant at first, he agrees to help Lowell with the documents because he needs the money after being fired from tobacco giant Brown and Williamson. Lowell suspects (correctly) that Wigand's knowledge goes deeper than the matter at hand and works to get this knowledge into the public eye.

The Insider is a decidedly hard-edged look at the world, a story of morals and ethics that wouldn't work without great acting and superb direction. Fortunately, the movie has both. Despite the presence of Al Pacino, this is Russell Crowe's movie. Crowe gives a stunning performance as a man crippled not by his knowledge, but by the implications of that knowledge, and worrying about what that knowledge will do to his family and their future. It's emotionally grinding to watch him deteriorate in the face of death threats, gag orders, improper police procedure, public smear campaigns, and ceaseless attempts to stop him from talking. His family leaves him; he's threatened by a jail sentence, yet he still can't bring himself to withhold the vital information from the public.

Likewise, Al Pacino is in classic form – somewhat subdued, but brooding and restless. It's not about "60 Minutes." It's not even about the story, or Jeffers Wigan. It's about old-fashioned journalism, doing a story right and maintaining one's word of honor. When CBS won't air the story because of the threat of a lawsuit, Bergman fights-

www.biogen.com

BIOTECHNOLOGY IS REDEFINING THE FUTURE and Biogen is at the forefront, leading the development of several important medicines including AVONEX®, the most prescribed therapy in the U.S. for relapsing forms of multiple sclerosis. One of the factors that makes AVONEX® unique is the Biogen customer support organization, a team dedicated to helping those who use and prescribe the drug. By setting new standards for service and support, this remarkable team is helping to shape the future of biotechnology.

CUSTOMER SUPPORT SPECIALISTS

As part of this highly visible, collaborative team in our Cambridge headquarters, you will provide exceptional customer service on all levels as you counsel multiple sclerosis patients and healthcare professionals on therapy and service options. Through a six-week program, specialists are trained to assess caller's needs, provide well-informed answers to inquiries, track customer requests, and provide any necessary follow-up. You will also interface with external organizations and partners and internal departments. Requires a BS/BA in the life sciences or communications field or a relevant educational background in the humanities or social sciences. A positive attitude, listening/verbal/communication skills, and the ability to multi-task are essential. You will be working with other high energy individuals in this growing department where ideas and concepts come to life.

To learn more about Biogen's customer support organization, join us at Mount Holyoke College on:

Date – Thursday, November 11

made $981 more last week than this week, approximately 192 more people. It's now the 12th highest grossing film ever, surpassing Jaws. If it can ever make $30 million more it will enter the top 10, marking the second time in history that two top ten box office films were released in the same year (1994 with Forrest Gump and The Lion King was the only other).

Last week's other opener, Music of the Heart, held up surprisingly well with only a 19 percent drop from last week. Its $3 million was good enough for ninth place.

Finally, Fight Club finished its month run at the box office in the top ten, at number ten. Fight Club made $2.5 million for the weekend bringing its total to $32 million overall. During the weekend of October 17th, it opened to $11 million, which means a 2.91 multiplier, almost nominally average for the Brad Pitt and Edward Norton gore-fest.

Next week, the box office should get crazy. Pokemon, The First Movie is set to storm the box office on Wednesday (trying to take advantage of Thursday's holiday), with Kevin Smith's Dogma, Natalie Portman's Anywhere but Here, and Luc Besson's Joan of Arc all set to open for Friday.

the good fight. And Pacino makes a good soul mate for Crowe, as we see him become weary and disillusioned with the people and the world that he thought he knew.

Director Michael Mann (Heat, Last of the Mohicans) paints such a bleak, no-frill landscape that The Insider comes off as a good documentary. There's very little soundtrack to the movie, and what is included is epic chanting chamber music like some Greek chorus. The world is gray, lifeless, imposing, and always overcast. Mann contrasts the dark cityscape with Wigand's suburban paradise, and as the movie progresses brings the character face to face with murky New York City. Eventually, Wigand checks into the tenth floor of a hotel across from the Brown and Williamson building where he can see the legal department working to destroy his life. Even the Caribbean is dark blue and stormy. And even when Mann uses a visual trick, it is to show how despondent Wigand is, how simpler times and his earlier life flash before his eye, and how time and place have blurred in his mind. This word is most definitely not black and white.

Mann falters only once during the film, allowing a 15-20 minute stretch during which the movie is aimless. And even as the final purpose is revealed, to arrive at some sort of moral higher ground, it seems like a lot of build-up for such a subtle ending. That's what makes The Insider good, though.

The story isn't really a story at all. It's a human trial, "ordinary people under extraordinary pressure" as Pacino's character puts it. Sure, the movie is half an hour longer than it needs to be, but not everything falls into neat packages, which is what the movie gets at. It's much more complicated than that. Stick to this, as the Oscar-worthy effort by Crowe, the superb direction by Mann, and Al Pacino's acting make it worthwhile. B

A look at music from Arnold's latest End of Days frustratingly inconsistent

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

END OF DAYS
Soundtrack
Geffen

Hey, have you heard the news? There's a great new tour coming around. It features the Backstreet Boys, Slayer, Wu-Tang Clan, and, of course, James Taylor. This is thankfully a joke, but today's package tours seem to be veering closer and closer to such ridiculous diversity. Most obvious is the Family Values tour, which spans the music spectrum from hardcore rap to techno. If you never thought DMX and Filter would share the same stage, you were dead wrong. I'm all for the diversity, but if I want techno I'll go to a Crystal Method show, and if I want rap I'll buy a ticket for Run-DMC. Fans shouldn't be forced to embrace other styles of music just because they want to see Limp Bizkit. This hodgepodge trend has long been a trademark of movie soundtracks, and End of Days is no exception. While there are many quality tracks, only the most hardcore music fans could be interested in every one.

The big deal about the soundtrack is, of course, the new Guns 'N Roses song "Oh My God," the band's first recording since 1993's Use Your Illusion I and II. And by "the band" I mean Axl, and god knows whom else. Waiting six years for one song is inevitably going to lead to a letdown, but GNR still manage to rock. The relentless pace and Axl's vocals are the best part, but the guitar is muddled and boring, and Slash's absence is definitely felt. It's best described in the same vein as the excellent "Garden of Eden," but not as good. But I am no less excited about a new record from the former kings.

Korn and Limp Bizkit contribute new tracks, which are among the highlights of the album. "Camel Song" is trademark Korn, focusing on Jonathan Davis' vocals and Fieldy's unmistakable bass. The slow buildup to the heavy chorus is nothing new, but it's a solid track and a good album opener. Limp Bizkit's new song, "Crushed," features the same low tempo style of "Sour" and "Rearranged," and can stand alongside those songs as a bouncy favorite. Fred Durst's constant Bizkit references can get annoying, but the song wins you over in the end. Both tracks are hardly essential, but along with some other songs, should warrant a purchase for fans.

Although I was dreading the Everlast song from the minute I saw his name on the back of the disc, it turns out to be the strongest track on the disc. "So Long" deals with youth violence, and the song is even more effective in the wake of the recent school murders. The music helps establish a lonely and desolate atmosphere, and Everlast's complex lyrics shed light on a lot of different issues. Unfortunately, the track is followed by one of the album's worst songs, "Slow," by Professional Murder Music. The vocalist sounds way too much like Korn's Davis, made only more evident since they are on the same album, and the bland, indistinguishable background music is depressingly forgettable. I'm not too excited about their early 2000 debut.

Here is a quick wrap-up of the rest of the tracks. The two "vintage" tracks, Sonic Youth's "Sugar Kane" and Prodigy's "Poison," are both great, first-rate, avant-rock and techno. The Eminem track "Bad Influence" isn't a great song, but the hilarious references to other rappers and organizations make it a must-listen for all rap fans. Rob Zombie's "Superfreaxx" remix is as bad as the original, and his brother Spyder's Powerman 5000 track "Nobody's Real" isn't much more memorable. Stroke's "I Wish I Had" felt pretty long and drawn out, and Creed's "Wrong Way" is exactly what one would expect from these bland-rock masters.

Since no one is going to buy this soundtrack for the previously released songs, I can see this album only appealing to two groups. One is the recent bandwagon metal fans who just want the Korn and Bizkit tracks and think GNR is too old to be cool, and the other is GNR fans who have been waiting for Axl to come show these new guys how it's done. While the latter group gets their wish with a solid new track, it is the former who will be most interested due to the new material, which ranges from good (Korn, LB) to bad (Zombie, PM5K). Frustratingly inconsistent, but the good outweighs the bad. B

Team of individuals rule in MSG soap opera

By Johnette Howard
Newsday

This might be the stupidest thing I'll ever write. I know I know it. Subliminal. You see, I know it's only four games into the new NBA season. But I love (hate) the way the Knicks play (hug the ball) and get along (hide their aggression) for the good of (their phony public images) the team.

I mean it.

This is NBA basketball (narcissism) at the highest level.

I reserve the right to change my mind at any minute, you understand. But right now, anyway, the Knicks are reaffirming that the lessons of their amazing run to the NBA Finals aren't forgotten. And they're among the most entertaining teams in the NBA. Mostly because they're one of the few that actually move without the ball and play offense like a team.

All of this came to me this past week, late at night, as I was watching SportsCenter, and one NBA game highlight after another flickered on the TV screen. The clips almost inevitably showed a sight now familiar to any NBA fan: three offensive players exiled out on the perimeter, crouched over, and toeing the three-point arc like 10K runners awaiting a starter's gun. All of them were watching a fourth teammate try to set a pick for the star, who was dribbling and trying to throw a move on his guy while everyone else pointed at the other team and screamed, "Illegal! Illegal! Illegal defense!"

This is what most modern NBA teams have come to. The only hope the other four teammates have of touching the ball for a shot, let alone a rebound. If you think I'm exaggerating, is if they go get a rebound. If you think I'm exaggerating, is if they go get a rebound. If you think I'm exaggerating, is if they go get SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Questions of compatibility are unnecessary today. Do what you can to get along with anyone, whether or not they are a perfect match.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You mustn't let yourself enjoy too much freedom today. Don't forget that it's the rules that keep you safely in check at this time.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You may not have as many choices available to you today as you had hoped. It's time to change your plans dramatically and confidently.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You should be able to arrange something lasting with a Gemini or Scorpio native today, but a Capricorn native may remain a skeptic.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You'll know who and what your favorites are today, and you're not likely to be easily persuaded otherwise. Take the initiative at this time.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – A conservative approach may seem unappealing to you today, but in the end you'll realize the value of playing it safe – at least for now.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Fulfillment depends upon your willingness to take a risk today. Play it safe, and you'll only be so content with the way things really are.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Keep your head together today, and invite a friend or loved one to be a part of something that seems urgent or risky. Success can be yours.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Timing is everything today, and you don't want to wait too long before trying something new. A little excitement goes a long way during the evening.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You have nothing to fear today from anything standing in your path. You can overcome any obstacle you choose.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You may hear things that don't make sense today, and it's time for you to go after the truth on your own. Don't settle for hearsay explanations.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – Your passionate approach may not be called for today, and you may have to step aside if you're not willing to calm down and be more rational.

Minutemen make it a high five, roll over Richmond

Bankhead, Zullo pair up for big day

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

RICHMOND – There wasn't much more to ask for. The Massachusetts football team left the cold behind when it traveled south to Richmond to take on the defending Atlantic 10 champions.

Sixty-five degrees and sunny, the story was not supposed to be so glorious between the sidelines as champions of their own kind met, tightroping the playoff line with one wobbly step, sending their postseason hopes crashing to the ground.

Like it had last week against Rhode Island, the passing game flourished behind Todd Bankhead, who threw for 296 yards and a touchdown, leading the Minutemen to a 33-6 trouncing of the Spiders.

In addition, James Madison, who stood atop the conference standings heading into the weekend, unexpectedly fell at Maine, 26-20, allowing the Minutemen (6-3 overall, 5-1 A-10) to inch closer to the A-10 crest, gaining a half-game on the Dukes.

"We're in November and when you're playing games that mean something in November, that's a lot of fun," head coach Mark Whipple said. "What I told the team last night, I said 'you know what? What's more fun is playing in December.' And I could see them all nodding their heads and smiling. I didn't need to say anymore because they know what's going on."

Both were hitting their stride when needed. Richmond winning three straight with the Minutemen doing one better, but only one team would show up on Saturday.

After a 57-yard drive on the game's opening possession, it looked as though Richmond planned to go straight at the UM defense. On 11 of 12 plays, the Spiders kept it on the ground, taking nearly six minutes off the clock before finally sputtered at the UMass 25. Senior Chris Price then blocked Doug Kirchner's 40-yard field goal attempt with 8:50 left in the first quarter, keeping the game scoreless.

"We just kept our poise on the sideline and they got down the field and the field gets squeezed a little bit," Whipple said. "We just talked about containing [Richmond quarterback Jimmie] Miles and not letting him out and they ran the ball pretty well inside."

Starting as an ice cube, UMass would soon become a gigantic snowball recklessly tumbling down the slope. Richmond could only watch as the Minutemen needed just a quarter to put it all together.

Adrian Zullo, who set career-highs earlier this season with 11 catches and 125 yards in a loss to Villanova, went absurd and beyond that. The sophomore caught 11 passes for 210 yards, a UMass single-game record, and a touchdown, en route to his second Atlantic 10 Offensive Player of the Week honors this season.

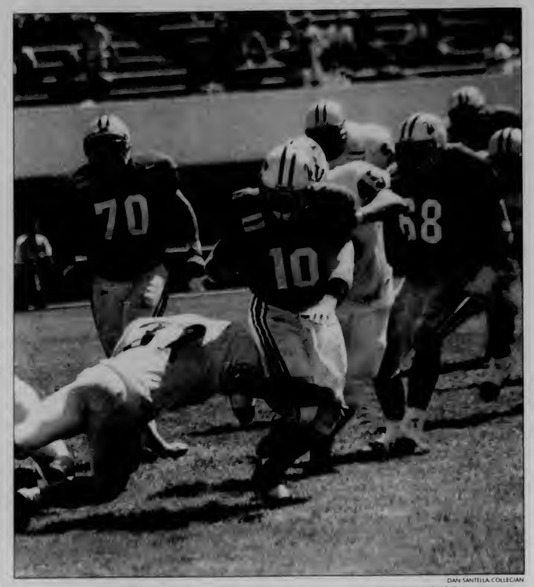
Still within striking distance at 19-0, the Richmond defense, who entered atop the conference in total defense, allowed Bankhead to escape a torrential pass rush, the senior co-captain scampering 28 yards down the right sideline for a touchdown. He would later add a 5-yarder on the ground.

"He's running the ball a little bit better. He's been able to get away, and I think that's because of his work ethic," Bankhead said. "He works so hard in the off-season and during practice. He's just played really well the past two weeks."

Once Richmond punter Tom Mahony pinned the Minutemen at their own 1-yard line, they began their second quarter romp. Bankhead completed 7-of-8 passes for 77 yards on a 17-play, 99-yard drive, and capped by a 1-yard plunge by Marcel Shipp to put the Minutemen up, 7-0.

After holding Richmond to just one first down on the ensuing possession, Bankhead connected with Adrian Zullo for 43 and 26 yards, the latter a scoring pass to the right sideline that opened up the game.

"I think [Todd] really gained a lot of confidence the last two weeks. He threw the ball well," Whipple said. "We had a lot of one-on-ones with Adrian, and things kinda clicked. Still, they were trying to stop Marcel and it opened up things for the passing game.



"They had a lot of poise. We mixed the run and I think it took the wind out of their sails. It was real big, and to come right back and get another one. I think it took some steam out of Richmond."

The Spiders shot themselves in the foot midway through the second quarter. On third-and-five at their own 14, Miles hit Muneer Moore with a perfectly placed fade to the left sideline, a play that was nullified by a holding call at the line of scrimmage. Two plays later, special teamers for UMass came through again, blocking a Mahony punt to the back of the end zone, recording their first safety on the season.

"It looked like they were ready to go for the block and the kids were really enthusiastic, so we said 'let's put the thing on and get it,'" Whipple said. "We made a big play on special teams, which we really haven't done all year. We've been solid and consistent, but that was a big play."

Just three weeks ago, Shipp ran for 176 yards in the Minutemen's 26-19 victory over Delaware, but has since run for a combined 124 yards in two games, averaging a lousy 2.3 yards per carry in that span.

While Richmond will try to bounce back at James Madison, the Minutemen hope Shipp can be back in full form next week when they visit College of William and Mary, winners of five out of their last six games.

Hawks, 'Cats tough tests for UMass

Blanchard, Stephens lead UM to first HE point

Emotion was riding high for the Massachusetts hockey team after a thrilling 1-0 overtime win at Army on October 29. The Minutemen looked to continue their winning ways Friday when the River Hawks of UMass-Lowell soared into the William D. Mullins Center for a pivotal early-season Hockey East matchup.

The Maroon and White have been unable to break away from the River Hawks since last season, finishing in a tie for sixth place in the conference last year and tying for seventh in the preseason poll. At the end of the game the teams were still on the same plateau, tying 2-2.

"I think it was a good tie. We were playing to win, not to tie," coach Joe Mallen said of his team's effort.

UMass did have its chances to put Lowell away in third period, but fell a pipe short when Jeff Turner fed Iedd Crumb in front of the net, but was stoned by Jimi St. John. Crumb then fired the rebound off the crossbar and the opportunity was squandered.

Mallen said, "I thought we had the better of the chances in the third period."

The third period did not open well for the Minutemen, giving up the go-ahead with only 1:03 gone by. Lowell's Kevin Kotyluk took advantage of an UMass defensive lapse by denting the twine to put the River Hawks on top, but the Maroon and White did not panic, getting the equalizer just four minutes later.

The tying goal was started by a great play along the boards by Martin Miljko who battled valiantly for the puck. Miljko held off two Lowell defenders and eventually freed the puck. The sophomore right wing found a streaking Nick Stephens coming down the middle and led him on a breakaway.

"He had the five-hole open. I knew it was going in, it was dribbling and dribbling," Stephens said of the goal, his first of the season.

Junior Markus Helanen who stopped 29 shots, once again, gave the Minutemen a strong effort in goal. The native of Vantaa, Finland showed his athletic ability by making a number of sprawling saves that kept UMass in the game.

"Markus made a lot of key saves," Mallen said. He has also been handling the puck more and has been acting like a third defenseman for the Minutemen. "Most of his decisions have been very good, 99 percent of his plays have been instinctive."

The Maroon and White were given solid efforts by senior assistant captain Jeff Blanchard, who netted the games first goal shorthanded. Blanchard used his speed to break in alone on St. John after the puck skipped past a Lowell defender at the UMass blue line.

"Blanchard was our best forward tonight,

DURHAM, NH – It's no secret that the Massachusetts hockey team has had a problem winning at the Whittemore Center since the University of New Hampshire hockey team moved into the building midway through this decade.

But then again, neither has any other hockey team who visits the rink on a regular basis. In fact, the Wildcats carried a 20-game unbeaten streak at home into last weekend, when it was snapped by RPI.

Saturday night at Towse Rink, the Minutemen outplayed UNH, but still came up on the losing end, 2-1, in front of 6,124 at the Whittemore Center. With the loss, UMass drops to 1-4-1, 0-3-1 in Hockey East action.

"You have to look at this as a positive. We played a great road game tonight," UMass hockey coach Joe Mallen said. "We got a great effort out of [goalie] Mike Johnson, but they got an All-American effort out of Ty Conklin."

Entering the third period, UMass only trailed 1-0. The Minutemen finally got the tying goal 2:13 into the final frame, when sophomore Iedd Crumb notched his second goal of the season. The Winnipeg, Manitoba, native cruised into the UNH zone, then cut to the net from the right-wing boards, and flipped a shot over Conklin to even the score at 1-1.

Freshman defenseman Samuli Jalkanen assisted on Crumb's goal.

A little over three minutes later, the Wildcats tallied the game-winner. Senior co-captain Dan Enders fired a shot from the left point that was redirected by Patrick Foley past Johnson. The shot struck the crossbar and rattled off the post before finally trickling over the goal line.

UMass had chances in the final 15 minutes of regulation, but couldn't tie it up again. The Minutemen had a power play with less than three minutes to play, but Conklin made a couple of easy stops to preserve the victory.

"It wasn't pretty, but we got a 2-1 win thanks to Ty," UNH hockey coach Dick Umile said. "Thank God we had him in net."

UNH (5-2, 2-0 in HE) had difficulty breaking the trapping style of play. The Minutemen dominated much of the game, but trailed by one goal entering the third period as a result of a sloppy play late in the opening frame.

With 1:50 left in the first period, both Nathan Sell and Chris Brannen were whistled for penalties. On the ensuing 5-on-3 power play, UNH forward Jason Shipulski chipped one past Johnson to give his team a 1-0 lead.

"On the 5-on-3 they had one guy

Minutewomen roll over A-10, host NCAA play-in

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

You can start saying it.

Dynasty.

The Massachusetts field hockey team made it four in a row in the Atlantic 10, shutting out St. Joseph's and Rhode Island over the weekend to capture the conference crown and to move onto tomorrow's NCAA play-in game at Garber Field.

The Minutewomen simply outplayed URI, defeating the Rams, 5-0. Junior Kristen Schmidt tallied a pair of first half goals, but it was Lindsay Abbott's goal just over nine minutes in that would prove to be all the Minutewomen needed. Abbott beat URI's Jackie Pizzi in the circle off a Patty Robinson feed. Schmidt scored just four minutes apart in the opening frame, giving UMass a comfortable 3-0 lead at intermission.

Tamra Geryk and Krysta Johnson netted insurance goals in the second half to secure the win.

The semifinal match with the Hawks actually posed more of a threat to the Minutewomen's streak than the grand finale. Just nine minutes in, Kerry Ann Jaggassar fed Abbott in the circle, and the sophomore deposited the ball past SJU's Lauren Bradley to account for all of the game's scoring.

After the championship game, Abbott, Schmidt, Anke Bruemmer, and goaltender Zowie Tucker were named to the All-Atlantic 10 Tournament team, with Tucker, who hasn't given up a goal in the last 226:49, being named the tournament's most outstanding performer.

UMass awaits the arrival of California, who comes in 12-4 after knocking off Stanford in the finals of the Northern Pacific Conference Tournament yesterday afternoon. The Minutewomen seek their fourth straight and 17th overall NCAA Tournament appearance.

See tomorrow's Collegian for more on this weekend's action.

Bad luck is bad news; UMass bows out early

By Michael Kobylanski

Hitting the crossbar in the opening minute of Friday's Atlantic 10 semifinal matchup was only an unfortunate sign of things to come for the Massachusetts women's soccer team.

The Minutewomen battled Xavier for the entire 90 minutes at Totman Field, but the Musketeers used three second half goals to foil any UMass comeback in a 5-1 victory. The loss ended the season for the Maroon and White, who finished with a record of 11-5-1.

"This was quite a bizarre game, one of the stranger games that I've been a part of," UMass women's soccer coach Jim Rudy said. "Actually, I thought that we played really well. The difference was that we scored three goals off of some of the better shots that I've seen, and we missed three that were just sitting there."

It appeared that things were going to begin just like the first game between the two schools. Back on Oct. 15, UMass scored three goals early in the first half and cruised to a 5-1 win. However, Bartlett and Kara Green teamed up to hit the crossbar in the opening minute.

As a result of the near-miss, the game remained scoreless. Instead of taking an early lead, the Minutewomen had no choice but to be content with a scoreless affair through the first 20 minutes.

"[Hitting the crossbar] was huge because [if we had scored], it would have been just like the start of the first game," Rudy said. "I thought that we were going to tear them up after that."

The only damage that would be inflicted for the rest of the first half was done by the Musketeers. Goals by Annette Gruber and Liz Singer put Xavier ahead 2-0 at halftime.

UMass started its upward climb in the second stanza, eventually cutting the lead in half on a goal by Atlantic 10 Player of the Year Emma Kurowski. Green and Kurowski broke into the Xavier final third of the field with a 2-on-1 break. Green drew the Xavier defender towards

ADP holds convention; Cevallos represents UM

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON- An agreement between the University of Massachusetts and The Anti-Displacement Project, Inc (A-DP) was announced last night at the fourth annual ADP Convention. The partnership will help to foster recruitment of more low income, first generation and students of color to the University.

Vice Chancellor Javier Cevallos attended to aid in the announcement and accept an award on the behalf of the University. A disappointed crowd was unable to personally acknowledge Majority Leader William P. Nagle, Jr. or UMass Chancellor David E. Scott who both were absent from the evening's events.

Last night, 300 leaders of the A-DP gathered to celebrate this recent agreement and to rally for continued victories. The A-DP is a membership organization that represents low-income families throughout Western Massachusetts. They work toward secure housing, employment, improvements in utilities and increased education.

The convention recognized the commitment of $22 million in funds to purchase and repair both Powdermill Village in Westfield and Whiting Farms in Holyoke in addition to the announcement of the UMass Partnership Agreement.

The new agreement with UMass is a first step in attempting to improve education for the youth. "Every one of our young people now have a better chance to go to UMass," Karen Giard said. "We know our young people have the ability to succeed. It's our responsibility to be the pipeline so that our children get that education."

The partnership, which began its negotiations last spring, consists of six major components. The first states that UMass will hold two recruitment nights a semester for between 50 and 100 A-DP families. UMass admissions and financial aid staff, who will be available to assist in filling out forms and answer any questions, will attend the recruitment nights. In addition, brochures will be distributed that outline deadlines and other crucial information.

Homework help clubs and on site tutorials will be held two times a week, each lasting three hours at six subsidized apartment complexes in the area. The general goal is to increase achievement in the basic subjects of Math, Science, English and foreign languages, to improve the student's SAT scores, while working on reading comprehension. Students at the University will staff the clubs, although a part-time teacher will oversee the program.

One of the main goals of the new partnership is to enrich the education of the students living within A-DP both academically and culturally. Through this agreement, the University plans to organize two trips to the campus, at which time the A-DP students will be able to become more familiar with the system and have an opportunity to speak with faculty and staff. Accessibility to activities at the University such as plays will also be extended to families.

The last part of the agreement will involve the A-DP hiring an educational coordinator. This full time staff member will act as a liaison between the A-DP and the University staff. He or she will oversee interactions, address any issues that come up and track A-DP students who attend UMass in the future.

Vice Chancellor Cevallos showed his encouragement of the partnership as he accepted an award presented to the University. "On behalf of the University, it's a pleasure to be here. I'm inspired and excited to see all of you here," Cevallos said. "We are deeply committed to making the University accessible to everyone. We have all taken the first step and I look forward to seeing all of you at UMass in the near future."

Excitement for the new agreement grew as the crowd chanted, "UMass, make it last," giving Cevallos a standing ovation.

RSO center opens to serve student interests

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

An idea that has been looming in preliminary stages for at least five years has come to fruition and will be marked tonight with the opening of a new facility. The Student Government Association and Campus Activities have together created a Registered Student Organization (RSO) Center as a place for RSO's that don't have offices.

"There was a resource room two years ago, but it failed. The room was not student-friendly," said Sandra Brookley, secretary of the Student Government Association. "This year our big goal was to create a RSO Center that really served the needs of people using it."

The room will include a meeting place that has a capacity of 10-12 people, four new computers, worktables, a lounge, closet space and filing cabinets. There will also be a computer technician available for questions, and a manager and a receptionist at all times to assist students. The center will aim to create ties between the RSO's and a consultant. According to Brookley, the consultant is an important aspect of communication that is needed when organizations create programming.

Although students were not directly involved in creating this new center, Brookley said the SGA and Campus Activities knew what was wanted from evaluation of the old room. The old room failed as a result of inconvenient hours, a lack of staff and poor resources.

By making this center available, Beth Saccamando, a staff member from Campus Activities, said she

Student responses to safety issues discussed

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Sexual assault and pedestrian safety were two of the issues raised during the University of Massachusetts Summit for Safety Committee meeting in Dickinson Hall yesterday.

While possible solutions were only brainstormed, it was agreed that a general awareness for safety was needed across campus to prevent accidents and assaults from occurring.

Last Tuesday, a student reported being raped between the hours of 5:30 and 6:30 p.m., adjacent to the Campus Center Pond. The assailant reportedly then fled up North Pleasant Street after the incident.

The fact that no one reported being in the vicinity of the pond during the event is a concern for the University of Massachusetts Police Department, one that was brought before the committee.

According to UPMD Chief of Police John Luippold, the incident remains under investigation mainly because no witnesses have come forward to the police.

"We're continuing to reiterate that if anyone was in the area of the Campus Center Pond, we'd like to have them give us a call," Chief Luippold said.

Committee member Jennifer Bishop said this incident has produced fear in students.

"Part of everyone's main focus is sexual assault because it happened so early in the semester," Bishop said. "A lot of students are now afraid to walk on campus alone."

However, Police Sergeant Paul Vlach said apparent student concern doesn't account for the lack of calls they have been receiving. He said students might not be reporting strange individuals or incidents to the police.

"I think what people should know is that if something doesn't seem right, they should report it," Vlach said. "But that doesn't happen. People should be taking a proactive stance on things, but people aren't calling us and we need to tap into that."

Kyle Krauss, a representative from Residence Life, agreed and said students may be afraid to push the red call box button with the word "emergency" on it.

"The primary purpose is emergency direct contact with the police and because it's in that context, the tone is out there that it's for emergencies only, it can be a push-off" Krauss said.

She said people seem insecure or afraid to use it, and are not aware of the full potential and usefulness of the emergency button.

Vlach commented on the lack of emergency calls police receive from call boxes. He said, however, that they recently received a call from a resident off-campus reporting a strange individual wearing a ski mask. Police responded only to discover that the individual was dressed appropriately for the weather.

Still, Vlach said this incident was substantial and should have been reported to them. At all times, students should be calling them about individuals who are dressed strangely or may appear to be stalking them.

Jennifer Teixeira, associate speaker of the Student Government Association (SGA), said students should become aware of this concern and take an educational approach. She suggested the SGA organize a campus-wide Safety Awareness Day in conjunction with the Everywoman's Center.

Teixeira also proposed a more immediate solution, saying that the awareness day would incorporate a lot of work and planning; she suggested that Resident Assistants need to become aware of campus safety issues through training and programs. No immediate solution was agreed upon, but Teixeira Krauss and the committee agreed to continue working on a date for the Safety Awareness Day.

To address concerns for pedestrian safety, the Physical Plant placed six signs on Massachusetts Avenue to alert drivers of pedestrians. Sarah Bos from the Office of Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs said more people are stopping at crosswalks since the signs have gone up.

The committee discussed further safety measures including the proposal to install rumble strips. However, it was agreed that the strips were ineffective at the slower posted speeds on campus and would possibly decrease tire traction during slippery weather. Instead, the committee discussed inscribing 'Stop and look' signs on the curb pavement to alert pedestrians to look both ways before crossing the roads.

Officers chase man charged with larceny

By Sam Wilkinson

After running from University of Massachusetts Police officers, Alfred Gooden, 24, of Florence, was arrested Monday after one officer was forced to display his service pistol. Gooden was charged with two counts of larceny over $250.

"We got a call on Monday at 9:12 a.m. and received a report of a suspicious person at Goodell," said Barbara O'Connor, the UMPD Deputy Chief of Police. "An individual reported that a man might have stolen her pocketbook.

The woman who called in the suspicious person called the police after greeting Gooden in the lobby of the Goodell building. She then ran into Gooden outside of her office, and he told her that he had found a pocketbook. He returned the pocketbook to the woman.

"The women who reported the incident said she knew the man was living because she'd placed the pocketbook in her office before she'd left to go downstairs," O'Connor said.

O'Connor said the pocketbook contained several books valued at $500 and a wallet. The wallet was later found in a trashcan.

According to O'Connor, after the woman called the police to report the suspicious person, officers received a description of the individual. He was located at the Curry Hicks Cage.

"The individual was located and then officers spoke to him," O'Connor said. "He spoke to officers for a few minutes, but then he fled."

Officers chased after Gooden, and were led to believe that he may have been armed. Officers caught up to Gooden at the Whitmore Administration Building.

"The individual reached under his coat several times, towards his back, as if he might have had something tucked into his belt," O'Connor said. "Officers pursued the individual, and one pulled his service pistol from its holster and then displayed it."

Gooden was then arrested and charged. It was also discovered that there was an outstanding warrant for his arrest, but O'Connor did not know who had issued the warrant.

She said that the arrest is a good example of what prompt reporting of a situation can accomplish.

"Clearly, people should always lock their valuables if they won't be in their rooms," O'Connor said, adding, "but this is a perfect example of how reporting a suspicious individual to police can bring about a resolution to a situation."

High court to review student's objection to activity fees

By Joan Biskupic
Washington Post

WASHINGTON – A conflict between a conservative Christian law student and a public university famous for its liberalism arrives at the Supreme Court this week, in a free-speech controversy that could affect campuses nationwide and possibly impact government funding of political or artistic expression.

The dispute concerns whether the University of Wisconsin at Madison – or any other state school – can force students to pay "activity fees" that go, in part, to groups engaging in political advocacy the students may oppose, on topics such as abortion or environmentalism. Provoking dozens of "friend of the court" briefs, the case is significant mostly for America's campuses, where ideas are exchanged and society's dilemmas debated. But an eventual ruling could touch on recurring controversies over government funding at all levels for free expression and the arts.

The case before the court began when law student Scott Southworth objected that his student-activity fees were indirectly supporting several liberal University of Wisconsin student groups, including the UW Greens, Amnesty International, the Campus Women's Center and the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender Campus Center. "It was a gut-level thing," Southworth said, explaining that he opposed "being forced to support the propagation of opinions that I disagree with – on an ideological basis, a political basis and especially a religious basis."

Many public universities collect student-activity fees that are funneled to campus organizations for their various projects and pursuits, and as a result, several other states have joined the case. One "friend of the court" brief, signed by 15 states, defended student funding for campus groups by arguing that "these programs further educational goals by fostering 'a marketplace of ideas ... [and] exposing students to a variety of viewpoints."

Scores of other education, labor, and political groups have also jumped in with amicus briefs. The Virginia-based American Center for Law and Justice asserts that forcing someone to pay fees for political advocacy he opposes "is a fundamental violation of virtually every right in the First Amendment."

hopes that "students will feel more connected and have easier assess to the materials they need to successfully run an organization."

The need for the center comes from the fact that only 15 of the approximately 250 RSO's on campus actually have an office. The other organizations can benefit from not only a place to meet, but also a location where they can store materials.

The center will be a place where the RSOs can accomplish a majority of their planning and organizing for their group. "It's kind of similar to one-stop shopping," Brookley said.

Representatives from both the SGA and Campus Activities see the facility as just the beginning and wish to continue to improve the center in the future.

"I really hope RSO's come and use the center," Brookley said. "We're looking for feedback and criticism to help continue to improve the room. We don't want the center to fail again."

All RSO's are invited to the grand opening of the Resource Center being held tonight in the Student Union Building from 7 to 9 p.m.

Supreme Court refuses to speed up death row delays

By Lyle Denniston
Baltimore Sun

WASHINGTON – The Supreme Court refused yesterday to direct states to step up the pace of executions so that inmates do not have to wait on death row for years.

Over two justices' objections, the court turned down the appeals of Florida and Nebraska inmates, who argued that it is "cruel and unusual punishment" to execute a prisoner after he has had to spend years in suspense and fear in the closely confined quarters on death row.

The inmates contended that, when the delay is the fault of the state, not the inmate, the Constitution should block execution after postponements that run 20 years or beyond.

Florida inmate Thomas Knight, who also uses the name Askari Abdullah Muhammad, has been on death row 24 years and six months. Nebraska prisoner Carey Dean Moore has awaited execution for 19 years and four months. Each was sentenced to death after being convicted of murder.

For years, a majority of the justices has shown deep impatience over the time-consuming delays of execution that result from repeated appeals by inmates. But it has displayed no interest – although the issue has been raised several times – in delays that could be blamed on state inaction.

Although the majority gave no explanation for turning down the latest appeals, Justice Clarence Thomas, who voted in the majority, issued an opinion chastising those colleagues who have voted to add to the rights of prisoners facing execution.

"Consistency would seem to demand that those who accept our death penalty jurisprudence as a given also accept the lengthy delay between sentencing and execution as a necessary consequence," Thomas said. He called the series of court rulings on death row inmates' rights "Byzantine."

Although the other justices' votes were not publicly reported, joining Thomas in the majority apparently were Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Anthony M. Kennedy, Sandra Day O'Connor, David H. Souter and Antonin Scalia.

Justice John Paul Stevens, who began arguing four years ago that there was some foundation for the claim that execution was unconstitutional after long delays, filed a brief objection.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer, who dissented, wrote that "the claim that time has rendered the execution inhuman is a particularly strong one. I believe this court should consider that claim now." He noted that some inmates have become insane while awaiting execution.

In the Florida and Nebraska cases, he said, the delays had resulted largely from rulings by courts that the states' death penalty procedures were unconstitutional, requiring the states to rewrite their laws and start over with new sentences.

Breyer said that recent statistics have shown that some 125 prisoners had been on death row since 1980 or before.

Relatives of Flight 990 victims attend memorial near crash site

By Mohamad Bazzi
Newsday

NEWPORT, R.I. — One by one, they walked down a paved path and stood on a rocky beach gazing out over the Atlantic Ocean. Some whispered prayers as others threw flowers into the choppy waters.

Many held onto their white roses and carnations, and placed them in a wicker basket that was taken aboard a Coast Guard helicopter to be dropped Tuesday about 100 miles away.

For the relatives of the 217 victims of EgyptAir Flight 990, this rocky beach at the edge of Brenton Point State Park was the closest they could come to the bodies of family members who died when the Boeing 767 plunged into the ocean Oct. 31.

As she approached the water Sunday afternoon, one woman wailed, "My baby. My baby." She was overcome and had to be helped to the beach. Many others wept and wiped away tears as they stood under a melting sun. Some Muslims mumbled, "Allahu Akbar," or "God is Great," and quietly recited the opening verse of the Koran.

It was a rite of remembrance similar to the memorials that followed the crash of TWA Flight 800 off the coast of Long Island, N.Y., and Swissair Flight 111 near Nova Scotia — relatives coming to the water to weep, reflect and remember.

Sunday's emotional scene followed an interfaith memorial service inside a white tent facing the ocean. About 300 relatives sat on metal chairs, many with their heads bowed or leaning on others for support. listening to politicians, clergy members and relief workers offer words of sympathy.

"Your loss is great, your pain deep, but you must find solace in the memory of those wonderful moments you shared with your loved ones," said Nabil Al Fahmy, the Egyptian ambassador to the United States. He stood behind a podium covered with a bouquet of white carnations and read from the Bible and the Koran.

At a table at the front of the tent were flags representing the homelands of the victims: the United States, Egypt, Canada, Syria, Sudan, Germany and Zimbabwe. Christian, Jewish and Muslim leaders read passages from their holy books and gave brief sermons.

Some men wore shirts and ties; others jeans and leather jackets, and some wore skullcaps and yarmulkes. Muslim women wore white headscarves and black dresses, the traditional clothing of mourning.

"Voices have been stilled. Hearts have been stopped. Laughter has departed. Joy has fled," said Rabbi Mark Jagsolinzer, president of the Rhode Island Board of Rabbis. "The chain of love has lost a vital link."

Ahmad Elhattab, secretary general of the Islamic Society of North America, said in Arabic, "In this hour of our extreme sadness, let us remember that this is the will of Almighty God."

He recited a verse from the Koran used by Muslims at funerals and prayer services throughout the world: "We belong to God and to him we shall return."

As Elhattab spoke, many relatives shook their heads and wiped tears from their eyes.

After the half-hour service, family members were led to the water through a corridor formed by military personnel and caregivers including workers from the American Red Cross, the National Transportation Safety Board and the Salvation Army. They were given one white rose and carnation each to drop in the wicker basket or at sea. Some had brought their own bouquets as well. Many kissed their flowers before placing them in the basket.

On a table nearby, the American Red Cross laid out 100 small bottles filled with seawater for relatives to take back home.

A military honor guard carried the basket to a Coast Guard helicopter, which will drop it today at the crash site, more than 50 miles off the coast of Nantucket, Mass. Relatives requested that the drop be done in daylight, so it can be videotaped by the Coast Guard.

After taking off, the helicopter hovered overhead for a few minutes before departing. Standing on the rocky beach, some relatives wiped away tears as others waved wearily.

Brain chemical found that may help treat stroke

By Jamie Talan
Newsday

Scientists have identified a new and novel brain chemical that defies long-held beliefs about the way nerve cells behave. And this finding, reported in this week's Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, could ultimately lead to treatments for a variety of brain diseases, including stroke, researchers said.

"This might be a gentler and safer way to prevent or treat stroke," said Dr. Solomon Snyder, a neuroscientist at Johns Hopkins Medical Institutions and lead author of the study. "This is a very unusual brain chemical."

The chemical is called D-serine and it is the first of its kind found in humans and other mammals. The brain chemical is produced by astrocytes – support cells for neurons, the key players in learning, memory and behavior. No other brain transmitter has ever been shown to work outside of neurons.

On a molecular level, this newly discovered brain chemical is quite unusual. Normally, nature has designed amino acids so that atoms extend from the left side of the molecule. These are called L amino acids. There are also mirror-image molecules called D amino acids, but until now it was thought that humans and other vertebrates don't use these D amino acids. It's nature's way of keeping things simple. Each amino acid has a specific response, and having mirror-image molecules on hand in the same system might lead to a lot of chemical errors.

But according to Snyder, this new brain chemical is a D-amino acid, which is surprising because its sister molecule is L-serine, one of the 20 essential amino acids in the body. So why is D-serine present in the human brain, and what's its function?

Snyder said that he believes that nature created this unique chemical transmitter to act as a fail-safe mechanism for another brain transmitter called glutamate, whose normal function is key to so many behaviors. Abnormal glutamate activity has been implicated in stroke and brain cell death.

According to Snyder, D-serine is released from astrocytes, the support cells, and communicates directly with NMDA glutamate receptors on nearby neurons. It is not involved with any other brain chemicals. The Hopkins team recently isolated and cloned D-serine. They found that the enzyme it produces – serine racemase – makes D-serine from L-serine. The fact that D and L forms of the molecule are found in humans is "bizarre," Snyder said. "No other mammalian enzyme behaves like this."

The researchers also discovered that the brain cannot activate NMDA-glutamate receptors without the help of D-serine. "It's like needing two keys to the start button of a nuclear reactor," Snyder said. He believes that this fail-safe mechanism is key to keeping the very delicate glutamate system in check.

No rest for the weary

Are you at all familiar with insomnia?

Since I'm not a doctor or psych major or anything, and I also have no real intention of doing any research for this column, I haven't the faintest idea of what the actual, clinical definition of insomnia is. My definition, which is about as hazy and vague as they get, is the inability to sleep, no matter how hard you try, and no matter what you do. You simply cannot sleep.

Rob Schulze

Of course, when I say "You cannot sleep," I wasn't really talking about you (Sorry, if you had your hopes up). I was, of course, talking about me, because as you may have guessed I had a motherbleeper of a case of insomnia last night. Right now, as I sit here in the Campus Center basement, slowly and surely pecking out the words of wisdom in which you so love to soak up, I am operating on almost no sleep at all. The computer screen keeps becoming fuzzy and out of focus, my attention wanders to anything and everything around me ("Oh, wow! A box of copy paper!"), and the urge to simply plop my ugly face right down on the keyboard and catch a quick nap grows ever stronger/fbg4rt.

No! I will not succumb, because I have to tell you about my insomnia. It's really very interesting, if you have a very small mind. The scenario: it's Saturday night, and it's late. I get off the phone and fall asleep almost before my head hits the pillow. About an hour later I wake up, realize that I've been sleeping at the wrong end of the bed, go to the bathroom, climb back up to the top bunk which I like to call home, and immediately fall back into a blissful repose. Or so I think.

No, the last part didn't happen. I get back in bed and lay there, staring at the ceiling, wondering why I am not at all and in the sleepy. I am dead tired, there's no way around that – I'm just not sleepy. I toss and turn and attempt every possible contortion of my body in a futile attempt to get comfortable and pass out. I learned a great deal about myself that night, things like: 1) I should not ever bend in certain ways and 2) it is possible to crack each and every part of your back in a loud and painful way. In spite of this newly acquired knowledge, I have still made no progress towards insensibility, and things start to get a little crazy.

I notice that my pulse is going fast. I don't mean fast like Olympic runners go fast either. I mean fast like the Roadrunner on smack chasing after the guy who punched his girl. My pulse is racing. Each boat feels like it's moving my entire body. I feel the bed shaking with each mammoth pound. My vision swims as I am bounced around by the jolts. I get paranoid – am I dying? Would that necessarily be a bad thing at this point? Sometimes people use sleep as a metaphor for death, and hey, right then anything close was looking good enough for me.

It's starting to not be very dark out any more. I reach unheard of levels of desperation. I rack my brains for everything I know about insomnia, which comes out to a big fat "not much." I remember my sophomore year health class with Ms. Eddy, who taught us techniques such as imagining that your body is heavy and picturing your breath as a cloud leaving your mouth. The first one doesn't work for me because I don't have to be imagining that my body is heavy – it simply is, mostly in the gut area, and if all that it took to fall asleep was it fat, heavy body I'd be in the frickin' Guinness book. I try the other, but it doesn't work either. I don't smoke.

The sun comes up. I go to the couch and see if that has any affect on the situation. It makes my neck hurt, but that's about all. I go to my computer. No email. No updates on my rasslin' sites. No love, is what it boils down to – no love at all.

It's seven-thirty in the morning. I have a brilliant idea of taking a shower, thinking maybe that will help me. The shower is hot, very, very hot. It scalds me even more awake. I crawl back in my bed a broken man. Each individual eyelid weights, at minimum, seventeen trillion tons. Perhaps more. It is now very bright in my room. I am miserable, a shell of a college student who would sell his soul just for a few winks. It's eight in the morning. I clutch Frikidu the duck close to my chest and give up hope.

I wake up at ten thirty. I figure I must have fallen asleep right after eight. Those were the best two-point-five hours of sleep ever in the history of the universe. I get up with a sigh, knowing that there is absolutely no way that I can fall back asleep now, with my flour active and the sun streaming in. Besides, I have to get my skank ass down to the Collegian and write my column, masterpiece that I know it will be.

So I got no sleep last night – who cares! I'm still alive, I still breath, and it is all good. I'll just be a bitch all day and bust the hell out of anyone who looks at me funny. It's a great way to be.

In conclusion

Question and answer

George W. Bush is a presidential hopeful, a former abuser of cocaine, and a mutton head. Last week Mr. Bush sat down with the always intense, always controversial, and exceedingly weird-looking Andy Hiller. I, personally, am a fan of Mr. Hiller's work; he does ask some pretty tough questions and more often than not, they are good questions. So Bush sat down, presumably ready to answer the type of questions he always does. Questions about education, campaign finance, and other political "hot topics". Mr. Hiller came at him where he least expected it; foreign policy. Hiller made a few inquiries that I didn't know the answers to, but someone who was running for president better be damn sure of.

Bush's daddy, the former president, was obsessed with foreign policy – he would rather sit in the White House with a dictator from the middle of nowhere than go and talk about domestic issues. Apparently, none of that rubbed off onto young grasshopper Bush.

Brian Lohnes

Question: who led the recent coup of the government in Pakistan?

Bush's Answer, "The new Pakistani general, he's just been elected – not elected, this guy took over office. It appears this guy is going to bring stability to the country and I think that's good news for the subcontinent."

Granted, I didn't know the answer to this question but if you did, step slowly toward the television and get CNN the hell off the screen. Having seen tape of the interview Bush looked like he was doing everything in his power to keep himself from strangling Hiller. I think I could ask a llama that question and get a less ambiguous answer than Bush's, "the guy that took over office". He struggled for a few minutes to try to remember the name of the leader and the only part of the name he could remember was, and I quote, "General". Nice work, George.

Can you imagine this guy in the Whitehouse?

"Mr. President, we have a delegation from Canada coming tomorrow."

"Damn those guys, they have to fix that fence so people stop sneaking in to America."

"Sir, that's Mexico."

"Oh."

And don't even try to get technical with him. Forget the names of countries, just make him memorize the shapes. This was real bad for George's image with the public. He has been accused of hiding in the shadows and having others do the dirty work throughout this campaign and, unfortunately for him, that argument just got a lot more credible. He was also asked just name the leaders of several other countries like India, Taiwan, and the always-at-war Cheenya. He was pretty close on Taiwan, he basically guessed and said, "Lee". Well it's half-right, anyway. So what did Bush have to say about this interview? He said it was another case of "gotcha" journalism, and basically he felt like he was ambushed. (It's not like George would know what an ambush felt like anyway, he was magically put into the National Guard during Vietnam). It's pretty safe to say that ambushes on national guardsmen are few and far between.

So was it unfair? Hardly. Hiller was asking questions that any really-informed person would know... and anyone running for a public office should be one of those people.

Bush's inability to answer questions has plagued him throughout the early stages of this campaign. He wouldn't answer questions about drug use, he can't answer questions about foreign policy and on the rare occasion when he does answer, his responses are vague and seem uninformed. It is pretty well-known that Bush did dabble with cocaine in his younger days but rather than talk about it, he has glamed up. I think Hiller's interview will affect the other candidates just as much as Bush. I can imagine that they are all studying pretty hard now, so they don't end up looking like someone who is being interrogated by the police on "COPS".

So now there is a small weak spot in the Bush juggernaut and the other candidates will no doubt exploit it. So what's the moral of the story? One, don't do cocaine and then expect no one to find out about it, I mean, really! Two, read the friggin' newspaper if you are running for PRESIDENT! Three, be prepared for an interview that will be shown to millions of people. Bush got lazy he figured that this was just another two-bit, hack of a reporter. Unfortunately for him, Hiller was out for answers on that fateful day, and Bush was left looking like a guy that just chugged a bottle of Ex-lax. Four, do not try to blame the interviewer if you are clueless. George, you would have been gloating if you had the answers, but you didn't, so don't go whining about how you were cornered. "Gotcha'" journalism did just that, George, and it's nobody else's fault but your own.

The good neighbor revisited in Columbia

Our government will, very shortly, be forced to make one of its most crucial foreign policy decisions since it invaded and destroyed Yugoslavia. And it won't be regarding the two million civilians killed by its sanctions against Iraq, or even the 400,000 people still missing In East Timor. It will not be regarding the stolen nuclear secrets in China, or the CIA's terrorism in Cuba. It will instead be regarding the Texas sized country in South America known as Columbia.

Thanks in great part to America's "War on Drugs," Columbia has been involved for decades in one of the Western Hemisphere's bloodiest civil wars ever. A democracy only in the deluded minds of its ruling class, it is in fact a brutal authoritarian regime where political parties opposing elite interests are simply not allowed. This repression, coupled with the government's economic mismanagement, has spawned the various groups of rebels, nick-named "Narco-Guerillas" by Washington spin doctors. The leading rebel group, the FARC, has been granted a Switzerland-sized portion of land in the middle of the country as a gesture of peace by Colombian President Andres Pastrana. These rebels have been virtually uncontrollable for the Colombian military and so required the creation of right-wing paramilitary death squads, which are, of course, all trained and supplied by U.S. military personnel and U.S. taxpayer money. Sound familiar? Perhaps you should consult your history books about the role of U.S. "advisors" in Vietnam and other third world countries such as Guatemala and El Salvador. You would find a situation very much like the catastrophe playing out in Columbia right now.

Naturally, the biggest losers in all this are not the 'Marxist' guerillas, or the paramiliary death squads, instead the group suffering the most is the Colombian people. It is estimated that since 1985, 1.5 million people have been uprooted from their homes by threats of death and forced to flee into the countryside. An October 21st article in the New York Times, says that almost half of these displacements have been reported since 1996 and the number of IDPs (internally displaced people) in the coming year is projected to grow by some 300,000 people. The Colombian paramiliatary forces are known to be responsible for upwards of 70 % of these forced evacuations, with the actual military contributing another 5%. This is not to say that the rebels are blameless, after all there is another 25% there to account for. The rebels have well known for taking hostages from churches and other civilian areas and although their brutality does not come close to the level of the military Death Squads, they are certainly not kind by any stretch of the imagination.

It is, however, the paramilitary forces, which are in the midst of carrying out a very deliberate terror campaign with the explicit support of the United States Government. The paramilitary activities are focused against those they see as either "guerrillas in hiding" or their "Base of Support", as Carlos Castano, the countries most notoriously brutal paramilitary leader, terms them. However, being a Marxist guerrilla movement, their "base of support" is, of course, the general population.

Ed May

The United States Senate is now being asked to increase its military aid to Columbia to almost two billion dollars for the coming year. The bill, the Alianza Act, proposed by Republicans Michael DeWine and Paul Coverdell, would deliver to the Colombian Military a significant increase in supplies under the pretext of increasing the U.S. "War on Drugs." These supplies would include, but not be limited to 15 Blackhawk Helicopters, radar systems, six patrol planes and 14 patrol boats along with upgrades for existing weaponry. More important than the supplies are the training programs themselves. In Columbia right now, there are already some 200 Green Berets training "Anti-Narcotics" battalions. Under the proposed bill, these programs will be increased substantially.

The idea that these groups are being used to combat drug trafficking is simply preposterous. Coca production has jumped 50-percent in Columbia from 1990 to 1998 while at the same time, the U.S. has contributed more than $600 Million to "Anti-Drug" campaigns (Boston Globe, Oct. 17, 1999). With a program that inept, why would it make sense to pump two billion more dollars into it? Apparently cutting funding for ineffective programs only works for areas such as welfare and education, as far as the military is concerned: ineffective programs deserve more money.

It has been proven in study after study that if the U.S. government was truly interested in winning the "War on Drugs," it would be seven times more cost effective to set up treatment and prevention facilities at home than to combat drugs either at the border or abroad. The truth is that the U.S. has no intention of combating the drug business in Columbia. The U.S. advisors there are doing exactly what they are supposed to be doing, training the military to win the war on the guerillas, not the "War on Drugs." The paramilitary soldiers are trained, as the Green Beret captain of the "Anti-Narcotics" program said, "to be itching to go to war – and to advance with maximum violence, that's the U.S. warrior's code." (The Independent, Oct. 22, 1999).

The real reason for U.S. support of the paramilitaries is the same as it has always been when it supported brutally repressive regimes in Latin America. As John Pilger showed in his October 19th article in The Guardian, what terrifies the U.S. Government is not the threat of communism (Guatemala), nor the threat of Marxism (Nicaragua), or even the threat of drug traffickers (Panama), it is the threat of losing control. With the Panama Canal about to be removed from U.S. jurisdiction on January first and a "dangerously nationalist" government now in place in Venezuela, it is up to the elite power in Columbia to maintain "stability" in the area. The United States' ability to control South America would be seriously impeded if the rebels were to take Columbia. With this in mind, two billion dollars worth of personnel and supplies is a small price to pay for maintaining the U.S. hegemony in Latin America.

The 1980's were an especially dark time for Latin America. Untold millions died as a direct result of U.S. support of murderous regimes throughout Central and South America. To this day, new documents are being declassified that prove the U.S. involvement in creating the counterinsurgency programs of Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, Haiti, Chile, Argentina and Brazil, among others. At the time of these atrocities the American People did not speak out, and as a result people suffered through horrifying atrocities and died unjustifiable deaths. We cannot afford to make the same mistake again. For the sake of our fellow human beings, we must not accept this. Hate crime awareness declines at University of Massachusetts

By Anna Faktorovich
Collegian Correspondent

Slim attendance during last week's Hate Crime Awareness Week may indicate that awareness and discussion of the severity of religious-based hate crimes is declining.

Decreasing awareness of the issue is also pointed to by a Project Pulse Saris' survey from fall 1997. The survey showed that, while overall anti-Semitism has been declining in the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, it appears that people are less aware of the existence of hate crimes on campus.

The survey also hinted that a rising percentage of Jewish students experience anti-Semitic harassment from instructors.

During Hate Crime Awareness Week, several forums and presentations were held to educate students about the laws of hate crimes. One group that has been victimized in the past at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst are the Jews.

Dr. Howard I. Ehrlich, the Coordinator of the Prejudice Institute and editor of Perspectives, stated that 20-25 percent of minorities experience at least one incident of ethno-violence during the year.

"If there was a virus that affected 20 to 25 percent of people, the government would declare a state of national emergency," said Ehrlich.

Ehrlich also discussed the lack of personal responsibility in today's commercial and capitalistic age. He commented that "people who don't like themselves don't like others."

Larry Goldbaum, the director of the Jewish Affairs Office at UMass, cited that an example of blatant Anti-Semitism was an incident that occurred at McNamara Residence Hall a few years ago. Swastikas were repeatedly drawn on the elevator of the residence area.

According to Goldbaum, the Swastika is an "ancient Hindu symbol that has nothing to do with hatred of Jews." Goldbaum continued to say, "Nazis adopted them and simultaneously killed 6 million Jews in World War II." However, the Nazis also killed about 5 million people who were Africans, Gypsies, communists, homosexuals and mentally ill. As Goldbaum says, "a swastika can be anti-Semitic or it can be against other students; but when a Jew sees a swastika, it feels anti-Semitic."

As a temporary solution, the administration sent a letter to every resident in McNamara signed by the Chief of Police, the Dean of Students and other administrative members. The letter stated that the reappearing graffiti is unacceptable and asked for the students' help in finding the violators.

Another possible solution to hate crimes that Goldbaum presented is the recent public response to the Gorman incident, in which racist and sexist graffiti was written on walls in the residence hall.

Goldbaum said that "demonstrations and speak-outs" are a sure way to get the communities' attention to the issue. Peer pressure and collective responses are ways to force the violators to obey the laws of equality.

While physical assaults or graffiti are extreme, and therefore highly visible, other forms of hate or prejudice may be harder to recognize and resolve.

Goldbaum argued that it is "inconceivable that somebody would come to the police about a verbal Anti-Semitic joke or offensive language."

One form of verbal assault or nonwritten or physical discrimination that Goldbaum brought up were incidents of "insensitive professors" who denied Jewish students the right to observe religious holidays and made discriminatory remarks following the rejection.

Among the examples that Goldbaum cited were African-American speakers such as Louis Farrakhan (leader of Islam) and Tony Martin, who spoke on campus a few years ago. According to Goldbaum, they both used "scapegoat anti-Semitic remarks" in their speeches, singling out Jews as the ones responsible for the slave trade. Jewish students rallied against the speakers. Tensions rose high, but with time the tensions faded away.

Another form of anti-Semitism that has been reported by the UMass Jewish Affairs Office is the singled criticism of Israel.

A spring 1998 issue of Shofar, a periodical journal of the UMass Office of Jewish Affairs, stated that anti-Semitic "double standard has been prevalent in the 'Developing Nations' and 'Multicultural Affairs' pages of the Collegian, where massive attacks on Israel and Zionism used to appear with numbing regularity (sometimes weekly). Over the same period, articles addressing the tragic events then taking place in Bosnia and Rwanda were conspicuously absent."

During Hate Crime Awareness Week, Chief of Police Luippold said that nobody should be singled out and discriminated against, especially in the UMass students' home – the campus.

Assistant District Attorney Steven Greenbaum, who also spoke, explained that in Massachusetts "if one is treated differently in a public place it is a crime, punishable by a fine or imprisonment."

Ehrlich said that "if one hears a Jew being assaulted one knows it can happen to them." Ehrlich added that, on a social scale, there is "never only a single victim."

Culture Unplugged

Never sure of what to expect in a foreign country, I walked as blindly as a drunk in the dark stumbling my way to security. As I ended my eighth month in Tel Aviv, I established my sobriety in a run-down office founded by Green Action, an Israeli environmental organization.

Awaking each morning to the sounds of chirping birds calling to me, through my bedroom windows, I began each alluring day with a brisk three-mile walk to the city. Cutting through the neighborhoods, across corners, down King David Street, and through the downtown streets of Tel Aviv, I battled with the crowds on my way to work.

After my daily chores and proper attendance, I arrived home to meet my four roommates for our nightly dinner, almost always cooked by yours truly. Pleasantly accompanied by those who became my family, we ate our traditional American meal in a traditionally Israeli atmosphere. Our tiny kitchen served us justly, and the living room became our third bedroom. Splitting the chores among the five of us, we managed to equally maintain the responsibilities of cleaning the dishes, taking out the trash, sweeping, grocery shopping, keeping track of our budget, and taking care of one another.

Dana Drutz

In three weeks we created a home for ourselves, occupied our time with substantial jobs, and spent many days on the beach, accompanied by late nights. We created what we like to call home.

Upon entering my freshman year abroad in Israel, my expectations were as scarce as I could make them. Hebrew, a language I barely heard spoken, seemed impossible to me. These seemingly difficult adjustments added to the depth of my experience, and assisted me in becoming more determined to dominate the impossible.

After 8 months of spontaneous days, minutes, and hours, I began to understand the way of life. Speaking a little Hebrew now, the move to Tel Aviv seemed easy. Each day I was fascinated with something new and given a purpose for being abroad. I became aware that, as an American, I was giving every Israeli that I met a new perspective on the United States and, in the same manner they unceasingly taught me, I too provoked them with new thoughts.

On Yom Hatzmaut, the Israeli Independence Day, my four roommates and I were eager to enjoy the fresh spring air and pleasant smells of barbecue, as we weaved our way through the park. Yom Hatzmaut entices families to an enjoyable day at the park, while work is adjourned for the holiday.

Swamped with energy-filled kids ignorant of their parents, a friend and I managed to find space to throw a baseball. A few minutes after we pulled out our baseball mitts and began to throw the ball, we were interrupted unexpectedly. We noticed a young Israeli boy that stood in awe at our movements, staring anxiously at our activity.

Bringing his fascination to the attention of his fellow playmates, we suddenly became the most interesting event. Not long after their initial recognition of our game, like many Israelis, they managed to shove their way in and attempt to partake in our game of catch.

Careful not to throw too hard, I tossed the ball lightly into the glove the little boy borrowed from my friend. A moment later I was no longer playing either, but suddenly surrounded by five little Israeli girls between the ages of 7 and 9. Staring at me with amazement, they must have thought to themselves, "Wow, an American girl!" Bombarded with questions, I couldn't help but smile at their interest.

Standing alone with little girls circled around me, I peered over at my friend and watched him teach the little boys to throw the baseball correctly. Answering one question after the next, while the hyper-enraged little boys ran around giggling and throwing the ball carelessly, I smiled understanding their eagerness for something new.

As an American in a foreign country, I constantly searched for new knowledge. I felt that, as a non-native in Israel, I was going to gain as much from my experiences as possible. The Israeli children helped me to understand that I was not the only individual becoming more culturally aware. They too were amazed with the appearances, concepts, and knowledge that we, as foreigners, brought with us. As a result of this experience, and countless others throughout my year, I recognize the importance of learning various backgrounds.

Cultural tolerance is an ongoing issue with which Americans seem to struggle. Cultivated with various ethnicities, religious backgrounds, histories, and individual concepts, America retains a diverse culture. Concepts, laws, and ways of life blend together to create a unique American society greatly influenced by foreign representatives who migrate to the United States.

It is necessary for we, as citizens of America, to educate ourselves of this diversity in order to justly receive the conveyed messages within our own country. I realize now that cultural awareness has become the solution to a problem so many of us face. Tolerance of diversity can lead us to profound knowledge about our own country taught by those other than ourselves.

Israeli, Palestinian negotiators begin intensive talks

By Lee Hockstader
Washington Post

JERUSALEM – With a deadline looming in 100 days, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators began intensive talks yesterday aimed at resolving the toughest questions that divide them and devising a blueprint for a final peace settlement.

It was not the first time the two sides have commenced a "final" round of bargaining to reach a comprehensive peace deal, but negotiators hope it will be the last. Under an interim accord reached two months ago, they have until Feb. 15 to fashion a framework agreement for a comprehensive settlement. A permanent peace treaty would follow next September – accompanied, many analysts presume, by the birth of a Palestinian state.

Talks to determine the "final status" of peace arrangements between Israelis and Palestinians were first convened, on schedule, in May 1996. But they were nothing more than a ceremonial shaking of hands, as was another session last year and one this September.

Under the original timetable set in the 1993 Oslo agreements, the talks were to last three years and be concluded by May 4 this year. They were not. Now the two sides have given themselves months to achieve a sweeping settlement that they once thought would take years.

Mindful of the urgency but sharply at odds over the issues, the negotiators, facing each other across a hotel conference table in the West Bank city of Ramallah, suggested they will meet two or three times a week in the coming months.

"It's a long road we have to cover in a very short time, but in joint effort we can make it," said Oded Eran, a veteran diplomat recently named as Israel's chief negotiator.

"We know that the gaps are wide," said Yasser Abed Rabbo, a close associate of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat who leads the Palestinian delegation. However, he said, the lessons of previous talks will be a "treasure in our hands."

The two sides met for an hour and a quarter, mostly to set procedures for future talks. They are to reconvene Thursday.

In remarks to journalists, both outlined negotiating positions that underscored wide differences on dividing up territory and water resources, determining the fate of Palestinian refugees and Jewish settlers and settling the future status of Jerusalem, which each side regards as its rightful capital.

As is often the case in Middle Eastern diplomacy, the specter of violence hung over the talks.

Hate crimes remain on hold

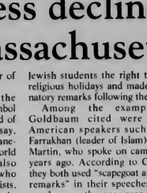
The other day I called an airline company's 1-800 number, attempting to find a future reservation. I jotted down my mock itinerary onto a sheet of scrap paper in order to be prepared for the agent's reservation questions. The line rang several times, as I waited anxiously to speak with someone. Just then someone answered! The automated voice teller had intercepted my call. Apparently all of the service agents were unavailable. They were speaking to other customers. But, the tone of optimism in her recorded voice recommend I hold on the line, because my call is very important to them.

Jeremy M. Goldberg

Test your knowledge: What do James Byrd, Rodney King, and Matthew Shepard have in common?

Answer: All of them are victims of Hate Crimes.



So, what exactly is a Hate Crime?

According to the article "Criminalizing Hate Crimes: A Jewish Dissent" by Matthew Brooks and Set Leibsohn,

"Hate crimes are defined as anything from murder to assault against a citizen because of his or her race, religion, gender, national origin or sexual orientation."

Is this something new?

Of course not! Throughout the ages, various people have been victims of hate crimes. Even the most widely read and published book, the Bible, the Egyptian enslavement of the Israelites represents an act of hate. In more recent history, the assassination of civil rights leader Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. is a good example.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Al Gore and Bill Bradley

How great of an impact do these crimes have on our world?

Immeasurable! 54 years after the murdering of 6 million Jewish people, the hate still lingers. Anti-Semites use various public media sources to promote their propaganda that the Holocaust never existed. I am still waiting on the line; I practically have the message which is subtly synchronized with the airline advertisements memorized. I have begun to hum the elevator music as my interest lingers elsewhere.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

George W. Bush

When will I be connected to a travel agent?

What is being done and what has been accomplished?

The Hate Crime Statistics Act of 1990, which was extended in 1996, gives responsibility to the Attorney General (presently Janet Reno), who in turn gave the FBI's Uniform Crime Reporting unit the duty of accumulating data and generating annual Hate Crime reports. In 1995, the FBI collected a reported total of 7,947 hate crime cases. Of the total reported, 4,831 (61%) were motivated by racial bias. Jews were the recipients of 1,058 reported Anti-religious incidents.

Massachusetts Senator Edward Kennedy recently told CNN, "We must stop acting as if somehow this fundamental issue is just a state and local problem. It isn't." Kennedy continued, "It's a national problem, and it's an outrage that Congress has been missing in action for so long."

The Matthew Shepard hearings (Note: Shepard was brutally beaten to death in an empty Wyoming field because he was homosexual) have been the focus of recent national public and media attention. This has initiated some members of Congress and includes President Clinton to update bills that would expand spending, applying it to Hate Crime prevention. This bill, had it passed through Congress, would have broadened the current definition of Hate Crimes, including the crimes that are "motivated by a victim's sexual orientation, gender or disability, according to a recent Associated Press article:

I can hear the seconds on the clock in my dorm room tick and the pipes click and clack as it prepares to heat up my room. I still wait, wondering if I am ever going to speak to someone about my trip.

Congress now plans to recess in a few weeks for the remainder of 1999, leaving little hope for Congressional supporters to "push the measure through the House and Senate." Hate crimes continue to be neglected by a majority in Congress, but the number of cases rises daily. While the congressional majority's responsibilities are great, it seems to lose site of human rights, the very premise that allows for a democratic society.

So I contemplate as I watch the debates and I ask myself who is going to be the next President? And will he or she implement hate crime policies that apply to all people? I cannot provide definite answers to these questions. But, I will report the following "hate related" information of the three most currently strong Presidential candidates:

Bill Bradley: Says if elected he would expand the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to cover homosexuals. He continued by stating that he supported gays and lesbians to serve openly in the military. Quote: "We simply cannot have gays be treated as a different category of person when it comes to violence." (Source: The New York Times, p. A20, October 17, 1999)

Vice President Al Gore: Says he would bring racial profiling to an end, making it "the first civil rights act of the new century." Minority advocates say that racial profiling is the police practice of singling out minorities for questioning at airports, on highways, and streets. (Source: Boston Globe, p. A23, August 6, 1999)

Governor George W. Bush: Says he opposes the extension of hate crime laws to protect gays and homosexual adoption. (Source: www.cnn.com, July 2, 1999)

So what can I do to help prevent Hate Crimes?

There are many individual worries for the next millenium and regardless how important the weather may be or improving your golf score is. The universal focus must revolve around cultural awareness. As Thurgood Marshall once said when he represented the NAACP, "I want to put myself out of business. I want to get things to a point where there won't be an NAACP -- just a National Association for the Advancement of People."

Marshall's hope to put an end to discrimination is a standard to believe in. Although in my opinion it is unrealistically feasible for all hate to be eliminated, (unless you live in an "ideal world") it still remains an individual duty to teach the younger generations about other cultures and religions to show the nature of indifference. There will certainly continue to be interesting presidential Campaigns as candidates promote their individual platforms, but for now

I am still on hold...I guess my call is not so important to them after all.

American Made Remix To Strip By

ROB ZOMBIE
American Made Music To Strip By Geffen

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

Remix albums: why do they exist? Does anybody like Further Down the Spiral better than The Downward Spiral, or Remanufacture better than Demanufacture? I definitely don't, but fans of remix albums will try to convince you that they aren't better than the original, but they accompany the original perfectly. Since when do I have to buy two albums to get one good one? And sometimes the original isn't even any good, as is the case with American Made Music To Strip By, a remix album of songs from Rob Zombie's 1998 release Hellbilly Deluxe. So I had high hopes for American Made, assuming it couldn't be any worse than the original, and thankfully I was correct.

In my opinion there were two good songs on Hellbilly Deluxe. You couldn't turn on a radio last year without hearing "Dragula," which was a good thing since it was a good heavy sing-a-long that definitely ranks up there with the classic Zombie singles "Thunderkiss '65" and "More Human than Human." And the forgotten track "The Ballad of Resurrection Joe and Rosa Whore" was a personal favorite of mine. It was a great song with an eerie, atmospheric sound (especially on headphones) with a build-up guitar chorus that you hoped would never end.

Somehow, both of these good tracks have been ruined on American Music. Maybe ruined is too strong a word, but neither is as good as the original, nor are they sufficiently remixed to the point where they are an enjoyable track on their own. "Ballad" loses nearly all its the flavor from the original with loud techno beats, and "Dragula" is so close to the original that the new compositions sound out of place and annoying. In addition to "Dragula," Charlie Clouser of Nine Inch Nails fame remixes "Superbeast" and "Living Dead Girl." "Superbeast" suffers from too-like-the-original syndrome, and the pace of "Living Dead Girl" is sped up to interesting effect, but it ends up sounding tedious towards the end, but it really drags on American Music. The remixes are noticeably less interesting, like the horrendous "What Lurks on Channel X?" and DJ Lethal's disappointingly uneventful "Meet the Creeper" remix. Until track seven the album is pretty enjoyable, and by far my favorite song is the "How to Make A Monster" remix by God Lives Underwater. GLU takes what was an instantly forgettable song on Hellbilly and completely changes it, adding an awesome looping sample and a cool drum loop. If only the rest of the album was this good.

Check out Rob Zombie's remix album if you don't want him to eat you.

If there was no CD included with American Music it would definitely get an A+, since it features what has to be the best packaging I have ever seen. A glossy digipak filled to the brim with awesome artwork penned by Zombie, as well as plenty of pictures of his insanely hot girlfriend Sheri Moon never wearing more than a hat and high heels. There is also some great concert photos and some really cool remix titles like the "Porno Holocaust," "Black Leather Cat Suit," as well as other remixes too X-Rated for the Collegian.

I really hated American Music in the beginning, but the experimental nature of the album and the few good remixes won me over in the end. However, it's essentially a techno album with some Rob Zombie samples, and if it's techno you want there are much, much better sources. For die-hard fans of Hellbilly or Supersexy only. C-

Inevitably a remix album is going to be unnatural and awkward.

Money talks... And we always listen.

Nicholas Pizzolato

A million dollars, wow, that's a lot of money. Where does one get that type of money? Working hard in your respective careers? Investing wisely on Wall Street or in the commodities market? I hear that pig's bellies are guaranteed moneymakers. That's the work ethic that our parents were brought up with and tried to pass on down to us, so that our generation will work hard, not only for ourselves, but also for our neighbors. This generosity will eventually make the world a better place. And it appears that the work ethic is paying off. Unemployment is at an all-time low and the Dow Jones reached a record high of 11,000. People are learning how to earn money, and then like pennies from heaven came Regis and ABC's popular new game show "Who Wants to be a Millionaire?"

That's right, the people who decide how we should live our lives have come up with another ideal for us to buy into. Forget about working hard for a living. Win a million dollars in an hour and don't worry about working again. Why not? It could happen. In fact, all you have to do is answer eight questions to win the million greenbacks. And to make them that much easier to answer, all the questions will be multiple choice. That's right, forget about working hard for your money. ABC has simplified life so that the answer to all of your problems are multiple choice, and it is from 8-9 on Sunday evenings.

"Who Wants to be a Millionaire?" asks the contestants to answer multiple-choice questions and win a million dollars for doing so. Of course, they have to put up with the ever-spastic Regis Philbin, so it's kind of a bittersweet trade off. For each correct question that the contestant answers, they win so much money until they reach the jackpot of a million dollars. But of course they're not really winning a million dollars. Reason one: do you think ABC would actually give out that much money? They're owned by Disney, and Uncle Mickey has an iron clad purse and barely doles out enough to pay those college students dressed up as Goofy and the twelve-year-olds working in a Indonesia making plush Donald Ducks, so why would they pay a cool million for Joe Schmoe from Intercourse, Pennsylvania to answer a slew of multiple choice questions?

Secondly, the producers make it impossible for that one person to reach the one million dollar mark. They lower all the lights except the four spotlights that shine brightly on the contestant. They play amplified heartbeat like music that has more bass than my brother's pimped-out 1979 Cutlass Sierra. How can anyone pick out who did the voice of E.T., when all they can think about is that annoying "thump-thump" sound playing in the background?

Thirdly, Regis Philbin is the host. You just have to feel sorry for the man knowing that early today he put up with three hours of Kathy Lee Gifford. No wonder he's so loud and anxious: he has to compete with her and the endless stories of Cody. And if you're not feeling bad for him, you hate him with his barrage of "Are you sure?" and "Is that your FINAL answer?" questions just trying to throw the player off. I expect one day to see a contestant say, "NO REGIS, I'M NOT SURE, SO LAY OFF!" Like one does not have enough pressure trying to win big; you have this little

The Pharaohe looks inside

Standing in deep contemplation at the crossroads of altruistic (yet still marketable) hip-hop, are Mos Def and Pharaohe Monch. As nineties lyricists, they have stylistically ingrained their lyrical impressions upon the most celebrated subterranean scrolls. Throughout the decade, each has scribed memorable passages on immemorable endeavors, vigilantly building momentum for their individual denotations. That time has finally arrived...

Pharaohe began his verbal fumigation on Organized Konfusion's vintage, self-titled debut in 1991. Alongside his teammate, Prince Poetry, the currently extinct duo countered twice more with the archetypal opus Stress: The Extinction Agenda (1994) and 1997's monumental scarcity The Equinox. Although Monch was well-received by those with their ears buckled to the ground, he was not properly commended until he began his campaign with Rawkus Records, the self-dubbed "skillfrack haven" of hip-hop. With aggressively suffocating verses on such 12-inch masterworkings as "Talking 2 U" and "Mayor," the Pharaohe has moistened our appetites for Internal Affairs.

He begins, in typically strange fashion, with a self-inflicted mental dissection. The subsequent song, "Behind Closed Doors," ensues the dark and mystifying aura, setting the tone for continuously lightless sentimentality. "Simon Says" is obviously the in-the-shadows, buck!buck!buck!buck!, raise your drink up, club thumping favorite with a magnetizing bassline coupled by Monch's dicey encouragements. Bringing the first painful beams of light, the Alchemist breaks the darkness with a spicy rhythm for "No Mercy," a rugged, fist-pounding collaboration with M.O.P. Daybreak is amply evident on Busta Rhymes vehicle, "The Next Shit," a caffinated jam with an enticing dance appeal.

While the metaphorically caliginous mood of Affairs has all but lifted by its mid-point, the album raises its own standards to altudinous heights. Diamond D (of D.I.T.C. notoriety) takes control of the boards and tingles a horn-driven anthem for "The Ass." In this raunchy sex-capade, Pharaohe intensifies the lustful rivalry between himself and newcomer Apani. "The Light" underlines the transformation to topical brightness with a riveting melody and perky, potent wordplay. And as the auditory rotations wind to a close, "The Truth" carries itself with a truly radiant shine. This profoundly poignant piece overflows with haunting, sublime production from Diamond and a fountain of triple-tongued wisdom from Common, Monch and Talib Kweli.

Although Pharaohe more prevalently represents the initial darkness (further demonstrated in his own production), he is outstandingly apt in diversifying his style. Thus, the overall results are a spacious land-scape of original, organic beats and clever verbal collages. Additionally, an extensive range of words-miths, tracklayers and vinyl cutters (most notably Total Eclipse of the X-Men) lend their talents to this hearty, well-rounded satisfaction. Although it is not quite a groundbreaking achievement, the monotonous moments are far outweighed by its refreshingly honest demeanor.

Regurgitating seemingly different revelations is lablemate Mos Def. As a culturally conscious emcee, the Mighty Mos has defined the element by equally exemplifying his passionate ethnocentricity and adamant "Love" for hip-hop. Yet uniquely, Mos began his trek to the aforementioned crossroads as an aspiring actor. In an early episode of NYPD Blue, he transformed his miniscule part into an enjoyable character. He pillaged on with similar silver-screen quests as his initial rap career, as a UTD vocalist, quickly vanished with the group's obscurity. He reemerged, however, with the Bush Babees on "Love Song," serenading the tune with his syrupy, baritone voice and sing-song, popo-stick cadence. Slowly, he began his secular mission, guest-starring on a sundry selection of notable full-lengths from De La Soul, A Tribe Called Quest and The Roots. His partnership with Rawkus ignited several delectable offerings, i.e. "Universal Magnetic," "Body Rock" and "Next Universe" as well as the overtly decent Black Star collaboration with Kweli. Still, through this arduous process, his devoted disciples have patiently counted their breaths like New York City "Respiration" awaiting a solo LP...

With Black on Both Sides, Mos Def brings a historical appreciation for boy culture. While his lyrical roots are inspired by such "Golden Era" emcees as KRS-One and Big Daddy Kane, he is musically influenced by a various spectrum of sound providers from Bo Diddly and Jimi Hendrix to John Coltrane and Aretha Franklin. The all-encompassing kickoff piece, "Hip-hop," culminates his affectionate bravado, lifting several referential themes from hip-hop's illustrious past.

"Ms. Fat Booty" continues the onslaught with an identifiable tale and an effectively catchy hook. "Climb" flows well as a choral duet with the talented Vinia Mojica but, like many of the somber-toned vocal abstractions, loses momentum in its progression. Unfortunately, Mos tries this style numerous times and often severs the head-nodding continuity of his incisive lyricism. Songs such as "Rock N Roll" and "Habitat" are well conceived yet lack the fluidity of a polished singer (Lauren Hill comes to mind). In addition, the song transitions are often so abrupt they startle the auditory senses sporadically.

Unlike the hyperkinetic Pharaohe's "Next Shit," Busta Bus and Mighty Mos lackadaisically trade mics in the bo-hum "Do It Now." The monotony pursues itself on "Brooklyn," an overly simplistic number in which Mos drops sub-par lyrics over a pair of recycled, Brooklyn-ite beats. Thusly, as the album concludes, it becomes evident that Mos definitely sparkles most vibrantly over hard, melodic rhythms. Psycho Les (of the Beatnuts) laces a bubbly cascade for the ingeniously witty "New World Water." Premier thumps out his traditional staccato grooves on "Mathematics," easily the year's sharpest lyrical output; and Ayatollah ("Ms. Fat Booty") returns with another pointy sensation on "Know That," an appropriated reteaming of Black Star.

Although Sides may not consistently demonstrate his full poetic capabilities, it is evident that Mos is extraordinarily talented as both a musician and an explosive intellectual mind. After all, for the Mighty Mos and Monch, the seldom traveled road has been chosen, and, having each wedged a formidable stake through the thoroughfare, only the beginning has been marked...

Disney Revamps and Moves to DVD

By Susan King
Los Angeles Times

Several Disney animated classics are entering the digital age this fall, starting with the 1940 masterpiece Pinocchio, which was released on Tuesday. The beloved fairy tale about a marionette who is transformed into a boy looks beautiful in its DVD incarnation. The disc also features the original trailer and a supplemental audio track in French. Colorful character artwork on the disc itself is intended to help children figure out which side is up when inserting the disc into the DVD player.

Disney also is releasing a new edition of Pinocchio on VHS, which includes the featurette "A Wish Come True: the Making of Pinocchio."

Pinocchio and eight other Disney animated films will only be available on DVD for 60 days, the studio says. A special collector's box set of all nine titles will be available for a limited time on Dec. 7.

Coming today are Mulan, Hercules and 101 Dalmatians. Lady and the Tramp, The Lion King II: Simba's Pride and Peter Pan are set for Nov. 23. The Little Mermaid and The Jungle Book will follow on Dec. 7.

Another classic family film that made its DVD debut recently is the 1939 musical The Wizard of Oz. Warner Home Video's spectacular digital version is definitely a trip over the rainbow. Though the digitally restored and remastered new VHS version looks gorgeous, it pales in comparison to the crisp, clear and vibrant Technicolor picture on the DVD. In fact, Wizard of Oz probably hasn't looked this beautiful since its release 60 years ago. Why, one can even see the freckles on Judy Garland's face. Warner is offering the disc with a new Dolby Digital 5.1 surround soundtrack. The DVD includes 107 minutes of extra material, including a behind-the-scenes documentary hosted by Angela Lansbury that was previously seen on TV, and a separate track with interviews from a 1979 TV special with stars Ray Bolger, Jack Haley and Margaret Hamilton.

Even the trailers are unique and fun. Included is a short black-and-white teaser that only screened at the Chinese Theatre in Hollywood; it simply asks, "What is Oz?" A trailer for the 1949 re-release includes part of a long-missing musical number that takes place in Oz after the death of the witch, and a brief sequence of an exotic dance routine from Bolger's "If I Only Had a Brain" number. The funniest trailer, also from 1949, was produced to appeal to adults and has to be seen to be believed.

An entire audio section offers outtakes of Garland singing "Somewhere Over the Rainbow," original Fin Man Buddy Ebsen and his replacement Jack Haley's versions of "If I Only Had a Heart," a rendition of "Munchkinland" featuring the voices of composers Harold Arlen and Yip Harburg, and the discarded "Hail Hail the Witch Is Dead!" number complete with a voice test by the head Winkie soldier.

Besides the beautiful underscore to the movie, the audio section offers the weekly NBC radio show "Good News of 1939," which features the stars of Oz and a promotional radio trailer. And that's not all, folks. There are excerpts from 1914 and 1925 movie versions of Oz, as well as a rare 1933 color cartoon. A portrait gallery features pictures of the stars and Toto, too. The makeup tests include numerous photos of the principals in various makeup and clothes. Included in this section are pictures of Gale Sondergaard, who was the original choice to play the Wicked Witch. Still photos of the special effects shed some light on how the then-state-of-the-art effects were created.

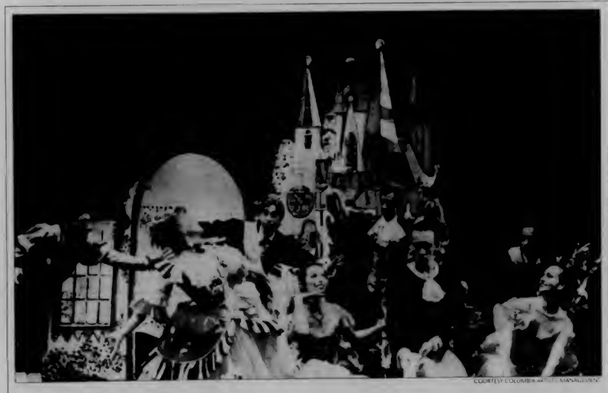
imp hounding you about your answer and whether you're positive.



Finally, despite the show's title, you will not win a million dollars. Under no circumstances are you ever going to see that money. Even if you answer all the questions without using the help of the audience or your phone buddy, you will not win a million dollars. Even if you get the million-dollar question right and the lights go to green, you will not win a million dollars. Even if the audience stands up and gives a standing ovation, you haven't won a million dollars. Even when Regis is jumping up and down and starts hugging you, screaming "I'm out of control," you have not won a million dollars. But if you're still not convinced, go ahead and answer all the questions and when you reach the backstage area one of the producers will cut you a check for one million dollars, you will only be able to actually use about $550,000 of that. The United States government helps themselves to the rest of your winnings. However, England (where "Who Wants to be a Millionaire?" originated) allows the winner to take all of the money, in this case one million pounds (or 1.6 million dollars when they are converted).

With the success of "Millionaire" during the summer, other game shows are arising from the ashes of daytime TV. NBC is remaking the infamous game show "21" for their audiences. "21" is most famous for the Charles Van Doren scandal, where it was revealed that shows producers gave the answers to the people who they wanted to win. Pee-Wee Herman (Paul Reubens) is scheduled to host the TV version of the popular computer game "You Don't Know Jack." The second of this new generation of game shows premiered last week; FOX's aptly titled "Greed."

That's right, it's the same network that brought us "Cops," "The Worlds Most Dangerous Animals, Car Chases, Train Wrecks, Pets, Police Chases parts 1-7," not to mention the Robbs Kenevil's "Jumping Off Buildings" series. Two years ago the geniuses behind FOX's programming hired Sinbad to help blow up a Las Vegas hotel on New Year's Eve. Right now as you read this, FOX is trying to clear with the FAA the right to crash a plane into the Nevada Desert. "Greed" gives contestants the opportunity to win over two million dollars.

"Greed" allows a player to eliminate their teammates and take the money that the other person has tried so hard to earn. Is there any better way to end the century? Decades into the new millennium, people will watch "Greed" reruns and will realize what the nineties were all about: screwing over your neighbor, taking his money, investing it in a get-rich-quick stock and then losing it all a day later.

UM men sink Central Connecticut

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Correspondent

The first two darts that have been thrown by the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team have both hit the bull's-eye. The team is 2-0 and on an upward surge for a successful season. They can only hope that the remainder of the season will be as on target.

UMass remained undefeated in its dual-meet appearances with a 184-98 win over the Blue Devils of Central Connecticut State on Saturday afternoon. Junior Billy Brown won both the 400-yard individual medley (4:10.00) and the 200-yard breaststroke (2:09.51). His time in the 200-yard breaststroke set a new pool record at the Jack Suydam Natatorium. Freshman Jared Toren started the Minutemen off on the right foot by posting a win in the 100-yard backstroke with a time of 55.80. Junior Mike Sabina won the 100-yard breast in a time of 1:01.46. Sophomore Carlos Ramos declared victory in the 100-yard butterfly in 53.39.

Henry Turner, a senior, won the 100-yard freestyle in 49.13.

On the diving side, senior Ed Hefferon wound up victorious with scores of 271.35 and 234.10 on both the one and three-meter boards, respectively. The end of the meet found the 400-yard freestyle relay team of Ramos, Antonio Maldonado, Turner and Chris Arsenault victorious with a time of 3:16.06.

In their first meet of the season, the Minutemen destroyed the New Hampshire Wildcats 164-121. Arsenault earned two victories on the afternoon. Arsenault won both the 100 and 200-yard backstroke events, winning in times of 53.69 and 1:54.42.

Brown swept the breaststroke events, winning the 100-yard in a time of 1:00.67, and the 200 in 2:08.64. Hefferon won the three-meter diving event with a score of 266.475 and took second place in the one-meter, with a score of 234.225. Billy Grimes won the 200-yard butterfly in a time of 2:05.96. Turner won the 50 yard-free in a time of 22.35, and freshman Tommy Keane won the 500 yard-free in a time of 4:50.22.

The team is on pace for a repeat performance of last season's torrent start. With a win over Boston University this Saturday, the Minutemen could extend their winning streak to three as they did in 1998. Unlike last year, they hope to continue this streak deep into the season. They have proved that they have the ability to do so.

As the team heads into the 1999-2000 season under coach Russ Yarworth, a pretty demanding schedule awaits them. In the remaining weeks of November, UM will host Boston University, St. John's, and Columbia in its next three meets before heading to the Syracuse Invitational on December 3rd.

UConn visits Amherst on December 11 before UM travels to Miami for a week of training and a meet with the Hurricanes on January 8th.

The days of January 14 and 15 find the Minutemen at the Rhode Island Invitational. At the end of January, UM will host the University of Maryland Baltimore County on the 22nd and will travel to New Jersey to face the Scarlet Knights of Rutgers University on the 29th.

Fordham comes to UM on February 5th for the last meet of the season before the Atlantic 10 Championships in Buffalo, NY from February 17th-19th. The ECAC Championships will be held from February 24th-26th at Glouster County, NJ and the NCAA Zone A Diving Regionals will take place in Annapolis, Md.

March 10th-11th. The NCAA Championships are March 23rd-25th in Minneapolis, Minn.

With the wins, the Minutewomen increase their record to 8-6 in the conference (14-11 overall) and give themselves a solid chance for a post-season berth in the A-10 tournament. Minutewomen beat CCSU Risotto solid in the victory

Not since the supposed discovery of the Loch Ness Monster have so many people been afraid to enter the local waters for fear of a powerful force residing below its placid surface.

Yet the University of Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team did more than lurk and avoid sightings by would be fans of their water prowess as they were spotted quite often on this past Friday unleashing a flurry of backstrokes, butterflies, diving, and freestyling on their competition.

Improving their record to 2-0, the wet Maroon and White defeated Central Connecticut in a duel meet 166-99. Owning most of the events, the Minutewomen left their opponents in their wake as they cruised to victory in Connecticut.

Posting a new Central Connecticut pool record with a time of 2:07.29 in the 200-yard backstroke, senior Elizabeth Risotto swam away with victories in both the 100-yard and 200-yard backstroke events. Risotto's 100-yard backstroke time was 59.48.

Junior Sarah Newell was also a 100-yard winner as she won the 100-yard breaststroke with a time of 1:10.63 seconds.

Moving down the academic line, sophomore Andrea Kazanjian secured a win in the 50-yard freestyle completing the race ahead of Central Connecticut's swimmers at 25.68 seconds.

However, the freshmen Minutewomen were not to be out done by their upper-class teammates. Lauren Bulkeley with a time of 1:00.52 took the 100-yard butterfly. While fellow freshmen Maggie Curry out swam the competition in the 1000-yard freestyle. Curry finished with a time of 10:52.76.

Yet the women's team did not just confine their rout of Central Connecticut to the pool waters as UM found victory on the one-meter board and the three-meter board. Freshmen Kate Allery recorded her first career win on the one-meter pulling down a score of 222.05. Above Allery on the three-meter junior Robin Velona with a score 202.15 took the event for UMass.

Currently on a two meet win streak, the women's swimming and diving team will now prepare for their first home meet of the season against North Eastern as they will attempt to extend their winning ways and that their ability Loch Ness myth.

MASSACHUSETTS SCHOOL OF LAW
Although it also produces highly intellectual programs seen on over 500 television stations and a general intellectual magazine that is read across the country, MSL's main focus is on teaching you the practical skills you need for success in law, business and government. We teach you to analyze legal, business and human problems, uncover facts and organize them logically, write well, be persuasive both orally and in writing, negotiate, arbitrate and mediate, try cases, and write specialized legal documents. And at MSL, you will be taught by experts who regularly practice these skills.
The non-specialized skills that we teach you, such as the ability to analyze problems, amass and organize facts, and write and speak persuasively, are needed not only in law, but are greatly desired in business.
MSL teaches you all these crucial skills at a tuition that is by far the lowest of any law school in New England – about half of the median tuition elsewhere in New England. The following chart of full-time tuitions illustrates this:

School 1 ..... $25,550	School 7 ..... $21,750	School 13 ..... $17,075

back to a post-season appearance, three earned All-Conference honors. Senior forward Adam Black was nominated to the first team. Black hit netting 16 times this season, and now is the second highest single season goal scorer in UMass history, and also stands tied for third in single season points at UMass with 38.

Senior Jonathan Bibb and sophomore Fred Kinateder both hold earned positions on the second team. Distributing balls to teammates for easy goals, Bibb ended the season with nine assists and joins Black in the record books with the second highest single season assist at UM. Kinateder was one of the players who finished Bibbs passes, as he recorded ten goals this season and personally put away three teams himself including Dayton and A-10 rival George Washington University.

However, graduation as taken some of the talent from UMass this season as Black, Bibb, goalie Todd Fowler who finished the season second in school history with 259 saves, and midfielders Todd Baron and James Redmond will have to remember the time they competed as Minutemen as this was their final year.

"Those will be big holes that we have to fill. Though I think you have Fred Kinateder who scored ten goals this year and Seth Lilburn who has the potential to score a lot of goals. Jeff Deren and Yuri Morales, are two freshmen that can certainly step it up and we will see what they can do in the spring," said Koch. "We have some young players that will fill those holes the best we can and we going to have to bring some new players in."

Now the remaining UMass players form this year's team and those that will play as Minutemen for the first time will have to look to the man in the mirror and find it within themselves to be as bad as they want to be in attempt to bring Massachusetts soccer program to even greater heights next season.

seven inch lift of her slap shot spelled trouble for the bewildered Ram defense.

"We had to keep running them and pressuring them, they're a good team," Said Schmidt. "All the way up from the backs through the midfield and the forwards, we all played defense today and it really paid off."

As the players were posing for their victory pictures, it was the unity of the team that everyone agreed truly brought on the win. All the women were psyched to have played a good game that incorporated even the younger generations.

"We did it as a unit and as a group this year," Said Shea. "Any time you can get the younger players into a competitive experience, it's huge."

And it was a huge display of power that both the freshmen runners and the senior tacklers impressed upon the Philadelphia crowd. The timing of the goals made the game go by quickly, while the Maroon and White tugged on the horns of the Rams with grace and finesse.

"Our five goals were really spread out. Everybody touched the ball and everybody contributed. It was a total team effort," Shea beamed. "One of the biggest keys was that they just went out and played."

Coach Shea was a big part of the game, as she never stopped coaching- the team was up 5-0 and she was still screaming like it was a 0-0 game. When the coaching finally subsided, the UMass field hockey divas cooled her down with a cooler of water over the head. Yet again, the team came through as a colossus, their smiles eclipsing the gold plating on their trophy.

NFL doesn't want Ravens to beat Browns bad enough

By Ken Rosenthal
Baltimore Sun

CLEVELAND – Brian Billick got the last laugh, and something he treasures even more, the last word.

The only way Billick would have been happier Sunday is if his postgame news conference had been broadcast live on Cleveland television.

"I'm just a frustrated rookie coach that's 2-5 – excuse me, 3-5 – that's just trying to survive here," the Baltimore Ravens' coach crowed.

Three times, Billick adopted his tone of mock resignation after delivering one of the most satisfying victories in Ravens history.

Three times, he subtly invoked the words of Browns President Carmen Policy, who had jabbed Billick for saying that the Ravens wouldn't get a call and that the NFL wanted the Browns to win the game.

Sorry, Carmen. Sorry, Cleveland.

To the victor belongs the spoils.

Never mind that Billick went too far with his pregame remarks, and would have been ripped coast-to-coast for inciting the enemy if the Ravens had lost.

The enemy was already incited. And rather than lose, the Ravens produced a 41-9 knockout that left an entire city down for the count.

It helped that the opponent was a sorry expansion team, but several Ravens said they detected the method to Billick's madness from the start.

Defensive end Rob Burnett: "When he did it, I kind of smiled. I knew what he was doing. He was taking the pressure off us, doing his job being the head coach, keeping all the media and fans kind of focused on him. That's his job. I think it was very smart."

Quarterback Stoney Case: "It certainly took the focus off Mr. (Art) Modell, off the team, off who's going to play quarterback. Whether it was his agenda or not, he did a pretty good job. It probably helped Mr. Modell more than anyone else."

Running back Errict Rhett: "I think that's the best thing (Billick) could have done. I hope he does it next week, too. We didn't get any calls (against us). On average, we wouldn't have gotten those calls.

"When you put that pressure on a referee, they really watch what they do then. ... I think they referred a great game, because of the comments that he made."

Well, the Ravens drew a season-low four penalties, same as the Browns.

But did Billick really have all this figured out?

"I'm not that intelligent. I had no other purpose," Billick said. "Again, I'm just a frustrated rookie coach that is not bearing up under the pressure real well."

Still with us, Carmen?

Billick apologized for his "lack of verbal skills" two days after his inflammatory remarks, but Policy showed him little mercy, and Browns owner Al Lerner also jumped in, saying, "I don't understand the whole concept of voluntarily misspeaking. Why don't you just keep your mouth shut?"

Informed of Lerner's comments yesterday, Billick cracked, "I think that's outstanding advice. I have not heard such sound advice from someone in a long time."

Alas, Billick can't help himself.

He said he might need a Popemobile to safely enter Cleveland Browns Stadium, and sure enough, a fan dressed as the pope showed up Sunday in the Dawg Pound.

"He can't have my car," said the pope, whose secular name is Blair Martin, and whose residence is Parma, Ohio. "I can't save Billick. My car can't save Billick. God can't save Billick."

As expected, the fans reserved most of their venom for Modell, but Billick seemed happy to take his share of abuse. He waved to a fan who taunted him with a plastic dog bone as he left the field, smirking with delight.

Yes, it all seemed part of his plan.

"You pick up the paper and on one corner there's (Tim) Couch and on the other corner there's me," Billick said.

"That's fine with me. Rather than our quarterback, our three-game losing streak, the focus was on me. So be it."

But was it worth an expected $10,000 fine?

Billick will have to decide that for himself.

He's no Ray Miller, misspeaking at every turn, talking himself into trouble. If anything, he bears more of a resemblance to Earl Weaver, who constantly kept umpires on edge, reminding them to be impartial.

"He's a man of integrity," proclaimed Art (The Silent One) Modell, whose megaphone has been stolen by Billick. "He didn't mean what he said.

At least not the way it came out.

All Billick needed to say was, "Hey, the crowd is going to be riled up. I hope the officials don't let it affect them." If he was trying to send a message - something NFL coaches do all the time - he could have shown more tact.

But then, this is a coach who asked for a "leap of faith" with Scott Mitchell. Bill Parcells would never have fallen into such a trap. Mike Shanahan would never provide an entire city with bulletin-board material. But Billick will be Billick, with an exclamation point, thank you very much.

How did you like the officiating, Brian?

"Outstanding. Unbelievable. I couldn't have agreed more with every single call," Billick said.

Your impression of the fans?

"There weren't many of them left late (in the game)," Billick cracked.

He was in such a good mood, he even praised Tony Banks.

He got the last laugh. He got the last word.

Any thoughts on Jacksonville, Coach?

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – In order to get the answers you need to deal with current circumstances, you're going to have to ask certain questions as soon as possible.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – If you're going to break through certain barriers today, you're going to have to do it alone. You'll have mural support, but you're essentially on your own.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You'll surprise friends and loved ones by doing something that seems entirely unexpected. Actually, it's been planned for a very long time.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Now is no time to be "heroic." There are certain things that need to be done, and you must consider practical realities as you progress.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – This is a good day to express your concern regarding certain plans that have been put into motion which present a number of dangers.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Don't be shy about asking for help today. You have certain things to accomplish and certain obstacles to overcome, and there are no two ways about it.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – The time has come for you to make a decision: you can go forward, or you can change direction. Either way, you will surely feel challenged.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – When you're not tending to pre-assigned tasks, this is a good day for you to do what comes naturally. By all means, prioritize!

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – While you tend to affairs that are not about to wait for anyone, someone you know and trust can tend to the planning stages of a future project.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You can do without certain things in favor of certain other things. All you have to do is make a choice, and decide what is most important to you.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You're in need of a little "insurance" today, and an arrangement with someone "in the know" can get you exactly what you need.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – A realization that something is unavoidable is sure to act as a remarkable motivator today. What you do can surely make a difference!

There's been an elastic band on the floor in the far corner of my bedroom for about 2 years.

I know it's been 2 years, because it was just after my birthday when I first noticed it.

It's a problem. I need to bend over, pick it up and put it away.

I guess the real issue is where to put it.

It's not a world shattering issue. Of course, I could walk over right now, pick it up and..... throw it into the other far corner..... but there's already a cute little green sock there.

I need more corners. I need something else too, but I don't know what it is. Got any ideas?

UM rocks Cradle of Liberty

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA— They could have just as easily been distracted by the greasy cheesesteaks and the busted bell for which the city is renowned. But instead, they sprinted up the proverbial steps of the sport and proved that they are indeed gonna' fly now.

The Massachusetts field hockey team played its absolute best game of the year when it couldn't have counted more, blasting Rhode Island, 5-0, to capture its third consecutive Atlantic 10 Tournament Championship. Four different Minutewomen scored in the romp, which featured superb tackling and blistering transition hockey from the Maroon and White.

"The biggest key was that we just went out and played," UMass head coach Patty Shea said. "We basically said 'As long as we just leave it all on the field, we know we'll come out champions.'"

Shea's troops came into the Saturday final on somewhat of a down note, after a lackluster showing in Friday's semifinal date with St. Joseph's. The Minutewomen may have been a little nerved up in facing the Red Storm, with the pressure causing a lapse in team play and a number of miscues.

"We just didn't play our game, we were nervous," said forward Kristen Schmidt. "It was like we'd never played before."

After prevailing 1-0 on a goal by sophomore Lindsay Abbott, the Minutewomen put their heads together and focus on finals foe URI. The Maroon and White went instantly on the attack in the final, with Abbott again providing early fireworks to put UM on the board early.

Rhode Island responded by stepping up its own offensive attack, and the Rams crashed the UM goal – literally – at the 17:51 mark. URI midfielder Kelley Barnowski took a hard shot that UMass keeper Zowie Tucker kicked away, then Barnowski ran full force into Tucker, landing on top of the Welsh goalie. The crowd fell silent as Tucker lay prone on the turf for a full two minutes, but she then got back between the pipes to the delight of both the fans and her teammates.

The Minutewomen would strike gold a second time with 5:29 remaining in the first half, when Schmidt blasted straight through the heart of the URI defense and smoked Ram keeper Amanda Herlya to push the UM lead to 2-0.

"Our forwards worked extremely well together," Shea said. "When they do a good job of channeling and setting up the defense, it makes everyone's job easier."

The Maroon and White could taste blood and came even more furiously at the wounded Rams in the half's closing minutes. A UM penalty corner with 1:50 remaining was thwarted by URI's Angela Bashore, but the Rams could not clear the ball and ended up paying the ultimate price. UM forward Sarah Bohonowicz gathered in the loose ball and flipped it to Schmidt, who again made Herlya hit the turf in vain as the Minutewomen went up 3-0.

"Every goalkeeper has a different style," Shea said. "We knew that they were going to be overaggressive, so we counteracted it."

The Rams managed two frantic penalty corners in the waning moments of the half, but two dynamic Tucker glove saves kept them off the board. The opening moments of the second half saw fierce tackling by UM's Nicole Bardell and Jill Fantasia, while Maroon and White back Kerry Ann Jaggassar was a one-player wrecking crew in the UM backfield. The Rams seemed desperate to get back into the game, and their aggression again cost them at the 19:53 mark.

UM forward Tamra Geryk put on a show of open field mastery, dribbling a full 40 yards through traffic before slicing hard on an angle to the goal. Herlya smothered the ensuing shot, but a steal around midfield again sent Geryk breaking away into the URI backfield. The Hatfield native would not be denied a second time, as a nifty switch move dropped Herlya to the turf and allowed Geryk to softly wrist home UM's fourth goal.

"They were trying to score some goals, knowing they were sacrificing giving up some breakaways," Shea said. "We were able to finish, and capitalize on some of those opportunities."

UM's final big opportunity came with just over 17 minutes to play, when URI again failed to clear the ball after a save by the beleaguered Herlya. UM forward Krysta Johnson snatched up the ball and angled sharply around the fallen keeper, shoveling in the open-netter to cap the Maroon and White's scoring at 5-0.

The remaining time of the contest was a story of URI desperation, as the Rams tried valiantly to break the Maroon and White defense. Shea sent senior co-captain Michelle Crooks in to patrol the net over the final 14:58, and the Pennsylvania native responded with her usual brand of top-notch play.

After the game, four Minutewomen were named to the All-Tournament team for their performances over the weekend. Schmidt, Bruemmer and Jaggassar were all named to the squad along with Tucker, who received the tournament's most valuable player award.

Shea's troops will now wrestle with the Golden Bears of California, with the winner advancing to the NCAA Tournament. Pass-back for the Garber Field play-in game is slated for 3 pm this afternoon.

PHILADELPHIA—The Liberty Bell may be cracked, but the Massachusetts women's field hockey team rang true this weekend in the city of brotherly love. As the sun shone on the St. Joseph's turf, the Maroon and White rammed the Rams of Rhode Island in a 5-0 win to capture the Bell Atlantic 10 Tournament title.

The weekend started on a not-so-good note, as the team barely pulled off a 1-0 win over host St. Joseph's. Forward Lindsay Abbott provided the lone bright spot for the Minutewomen with a first half goal off an assist from Kerry Anne Jaggassar.

"Yesterday we didn't play our game, we played their game," Said UMass forward Kristen Schmidt. "(In the final) there was a lot of emotion this time, we really wanted to win this game."

That emotion translated into a fast-paced domination of the upfield for the majority of game two on Saturday afternoon. The second game of the tournament proved to be the game UM wanted more, as it outshot the Rams 19-5 over the course of the contest.

This was really the story of two different goalkeeping styles, the aggressive nature of URI's Amanda Herlya versus the more conservative Zowie Tucker of UMass. The latter was decidedly more productive between the pipes, using her gloves, stick and feet to deny every shot the opposition attempted.

It seemed as though Herlya spent all her time at least 15 feet into the circle, and UM took every opportunity to use that to their advantage, easily swinging around and behind her for goals. Again and again the swiftness of the Minutewomen gained them the upper hand in the upfield, as they spun the ball into a winning web.

"One of the interesting things about me being a goalkeeper is that I know what it takes to score on goalkeepers," Said Coach Patty Shea. "As soon as you see the keeper coming at you, you just go soft side and you have the whole cage to just push it in."

Not only did the spaced out keeping of the URI team characterize the game, the speed and footwork of the UMass women also played a key role in this victory.

Senior Chrissy Millhauer seemed to be everywhere at once, penetrating the defense seemingly at will and slashed relentlessly at the URI goal. Though many breakaways were weakened by needless passing, the hustle never stopped and consequently neither did the penalty corners.

Anke Bruemmer, dubbed 'silent but deadly' by her teammates, was on the constant dribble and the natural

Grrr!!! Golden Bears visit Garber with NCAA Tourney berth on line

Two teams representing two coasts with only one thing in mind.

The NCAA Tournament.

Although the teams are very much different, much remains emotionally from the Massachusetts field hockey team's 4-1 thrashing of the California Golden Bears two years ago in Amherst.

When Cal revisits the not-so-friendly confines of Garber Field in this afternoon's NCAA play-in game with the Minutewomen, the Bears will return with little on their minds beyond advancing to the tournament. Their embarrassing defeat to the hands of the Minutewomen still rings in their minds, but Shellie Onstead has her Cal squad in tip-top shape, entering this afternoon's matchup at 12-4, good for 16th in the nation.

A 70-degree Sunday afternoon gives way to a bitter Tuesday, where forecasts predict the temperature could dip as low as the mid-20's in Amherst. While weather could play a part in the final decision, Shea feels that very little matters when an NCAA berth is on the line.

"It's a one-game season. It is a second season that you're playing and it doesn't matter what's happened," UMass head coach Patty Shea said. "What's happened in the past is ancient history and you can't worry about the future.

"You have to stay in the present, you have to play tomorrow's game. That's if you want to continue your season for another day. You have to execute."

The Minutewomen earned the right to host a play-in when it plowed through a pair of opponents en route to its fourth consecutive Atlantic 10 Championship. Lindsay Abbott scored early in the first half against Rhode Island in the title game, supplying the game-winning goal as the Minutewomen coasted to a 5-0 victory over the Rams, just a day after holding off St. Joseph's, 1-0, thanks to another early score by Abbott.

Shea's defense has gelled in the latter half of the season, shutting out its opponents in five of the last six games. The Bears come in having scored 14 goals in their last four games, including a pair of wins over the Cardinal, the final one securing its spot in today's contest.

"They have strength at every single line," Shea said. "They bring a lot of good senior leadership to the table mixed with a good core of freshmen."

Rams end Minutemen's season

Not-so-lovely visit to Dayton

Men's soccer team sent home

The Massachusetts men's soccer team wanted to be starting something as they attempted to bring their thriller of a game to Dayton, Ohio for the Atlantic 10 post-season tournament, yet were told that it does not matter if they're Maroon and White and it should beat it from the competition.

Planning not to stop 'till they got enough the Minutemen got all they could handle when they drew the number one-seated University of Rhode Island in their semi-final A-10 tournament game last Friday night.

Owning the first half, the Minutemen shut down the powerful Rams' defense, as the game remained scoreless after 52 minutes of play. However, UMass eventually faltered in the face of the charging Rams, giving up four goals in ten minutes. URI went on to record three more goals as they handed UM a 7-0 defeat and their plane ticket home.

"We played very well in the first and we had our chances. Our game plan was working; the players were doing a great job. They got one in the start of the second half, and we unfortunately made a couple of mistakes in the back and they put it away," said UMass coach Sam Koch. "Once we had to open up and try to push people forward to get a goal to tie it up, they just ran through us like a hot knife through butter."

Closing out the season at 13-7, the Minutemen tied the third most winning season in school history, and for the tenth time won 10 or more games in a single season. Amongst those 13 victories UM downed twelfth-seated Washington University, put away last year's A-10 champions Dayton University, and compiled two four or more-game winning streaks. UMass was a dominant force in the Atlantic 10 whether it was on the road or at home where the Maroon and White went undefeated in conference games.

"Our players did a great job bringing us back to where we expect to be. I think that the 13 wins were certainly a positive," said Koch when asked to reflect on the season. "The win over Washington was a great accomplishment."

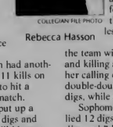
The Massachusetts volleyball team quickly disposed of two sub-par conference foes this weekend, leaving Duquesne and Fordham unable to sit being spanked by UMass this past weekend.

The Minutewomen took the court against the Dukes, looking for their seventh win in the conference. UMass came out with guns blazing, taking a season low 5 minutes to dismantle the Dukes. The offense was aflame, hitting a .330 as a team while holding Duquesne to a weak -.011.



In game one, UM had no errors with 9 kills on 18 attacks, all while hitting a .444 and taking the game 15-1. The Minutewomen kept on the attack in the next two games, sacrificing only 9 points while winning twice more, 15-4, 15-5.

Junior Rebecca Hasson had another memorable night with 11 kills on 17 attacks and no errors to hit a career-high .647 for the match. Senior Kari Hogancamp put up a team-high 12 digs with 7 digs and two service aces. Senior Jill Meyers contributed with 9 kills, 8 digs, and 4 blocks, while sophomore Lymarie Llovet added 6 kills and 6 digs.

Senior Anita Ball and sophomore Mindy Buhrow seemed to be playing with cardboard cut-outs of their teammates, as they were the lone highlights for the Dukes, recording 11 kills and 9 digs, respectively.

"We were very effective in the middle attack," said head coach Bonnie Kenny in a press release. "When we can run our middle attack like that, our pace of the game is so much better than that it really hard for the other team to get into a rhythm and ball control. I don't think Duquesne played its best match, but I do think we had a little bit to do with that. I thought we were determined from the start to finish. I am very happy with the way we played tonight."

The Minutewomen kept firing on all cylinders in the second match of the weekend, taking Fordham, 15-2, 15-4, 15-10.

Umass came out with something to prove, swatting an incredible .452 in game one. They had only one error connecting on 15 of 31 attacks. The Rams performed slightly worse than the Dukes, hitting a lifeless -.020 for the match.

Hasson again led the team with 16 kills and 4 blocks and killing a .525. Hogancamp gave her calling card performance of a double-double with 15 kills and 16 digs, while attacking a strong .542.

Sophomore Janeen DeMarte tallied 12 digs, while Meyers posted 11 digs and 7 kills. Llovet rounded out the supporting cast with 10 digs and 7 kills.

"Obviously it is a good weekend when you can sweep," said Kenny. "It was nice that we had offense, and I think that was the biggest key of the weekend for us. It was also nice to have four people in double-digits in the dig category. I thought we were very patient on defense and

Students react to two on-campus attacks

Second incident reported yesterday

UM students respond to charges of sexual assault

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts student reported being assaulted yesterday at 2 p.m. near the Student Union. The victim told the University of Massachusetts Police Department that she was walking on the sidewalk south of the Metawampee Lawn when she was grabbed from behind by a man and pulled into bushes.

UMass does not reveal the names of individuals who have been assaulted.

The suspect allegedly assaulted the victim before fleeing from the area. Both the UMPD and the Amherst Police Department completed a search of the area but found nothing.

The suspect was described as being a white male with blond hair, between six and six foot three inches tall, wearing a long sleeved blue rugby shirt with a collar and a baseball hat. The man wore neither a mask nor facial hair.

The UMPD is interested in speaking to anyone who may have been in the area between 1:30 and 2:30 p.m. or who

The area near the Campus Center pond appeared quiet last night as the University of Massachusetts security and mounted police spanned the area, but storming through students' minds were questions as to why assaults like the one yesterday could occur, even in broad daylight.

This is the second assault reported in the last two weeks. The first assault was reported to be sexual assault, and occurred last Tuesday around 6 p.m. at the pond. Senior theater major Benjamin Teig said it is strange that the second assault occurred on the same day, a week later, and wondered if there could be some connection.

"There's a definite chance that it could be a pattern and that it could be a copycat," Teig said. "When anyone hears a girl screaming, most people wouldn't go running to help because who hasn't heard someone screaming out their dorm window joking around."

The fact that no witnesses have stepped forward with substantial evidence in either cases, is leading some to believe that students aren't aware of the safety concern.

Shandra Richardson, junior apparel marketing major said she was made aware of the incident at a rehearsal, but if it hadn't been brought to her attention, she most likely would have walked back to her dorm alone and unsafe.

"I think that everyone should be made more aware of the incidents to prevent them from happening in the future," Richardson said. "I wouldn't have known about it if I hadn't gone to rehearsal."

While the incident is still a shock to many, students like sophomore biochemistry and molecular biology major Seth Newport are more concerned as to whether security precautions are being taken.

"That's just astounding," Newport said. "You'd think that some type of security precaution should have been taken, and it's especially amazing in broad daylight – how could it have happened?"

Freshman Greg Gader, undecided, is still searching for some kind of answer as to how it could have happened.

Junior communication major Michael Finnegan said he knows a female friend who is afraid to walk across campus alone to visit him. As a result, a group of students has organized a special candlelight vigil and ceremony to address the issue. The event, "Take Back UMass" will take place next Monday at 4:30 p.m. on the Student Union steps.

UM students, trustees discuss campus issues

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts President William Bulger, Board of Trustee members and staff from the President's office came to the UMass- Amherst campus yesterday to talk with students. The informal meeting allowed for communication between the students and trustees on several important issues on campus.

Divided into smaller groups, the students, a majority of whom were Senators from the Student Government Association (SGA), expressed their concerns to the trustees on a variety of topics. The trustees were also able to ask questions and get student input as to what actually occurs on the Amherst campus.

One table began their discussion with a question by a trustee in regards to the persona attached to the University. In the past, the trustee said, the public's impression of the University seemed to be that students were not getting as excellent an education as private colleges could provide. The trustees wondered if that was still the feeling on campus. Students responded by saying that the affordability of the University had actually been a draw to them and that although UMass may not have always been their first choice, they were pleased with their decision. They said they were receiving an excellent education, especially through extra-curricular activities.

This discussion led to the topic of how sports affected their experience at the University and sparked a conversation about the idea of the football team changing to Division I-A. While some agree the change would be exciting for the school, others brought to the table concerns on how severe costs would be in order to build a new stadium.

Food services was discussed at length, a conversation that turned to the issue of privatization. The students were given the opportunity to tell trustees how important they think student-run businesses are, and many individuals expressed how they were not in favor of having outside businesses move on to campus. The trustees explained that no decisions have been made, but that they are looking into finding out what would best serve the customers of the community; the students.

Students also voiced their opinions on the alcohol notification issue. The alcohol policy has been a stress for students and trustees alike, as the University looks into a change in policy. The students wanted to make it clear that they were not in favor of having parents notified for underage drinking. The trustees said they only wish to do what is best for the students of the University.

Weekend marred by incidents

By Sam Wilkinson

Homophobic graffiti was found in two more locations on campus this past weekend, but University of Massachusetts Police Department spokesman Jim Lyons called both incidents isolated.

Late Saturday night, graffiti was reported at Cance Residence Hall in the Southwest Residential Area. Officers reporting to the scene discovered a slogan written on a stairwell door in black magic marker.

At 8 a.m. Monday morning, officers were called to the Lederle Research Lowrise where they discovered, scrawled in black magic marker on a pillar, "BLT kills fags."

Lyons said the incidents were not related.

On Sunday, Angel Vazquez, an 18-year-old freshman hotel, restaurant and travel administration major, of Westborough, was charged with operating a motor vehicle under the influence and underage possession of liquor.

"Some females reported that individuals from a Mazda station wagon were harassing them," Lyons said. "One person in the car told them that they had a pistol."

The unidentified females reported the station wagon, which was later pulled over by the Amherst Police Department.

"The individuals were frisked, and no weapons were found," Lyons said, "but one person appeared to be intoxicated and the driver was arrested for operating under the influence."

Earlier in the day, Kevin Curry, 19, of Webster, was arrested after officers observed him walking on automobiles in Lot 32. "The three other males cheered Curry on," Lyons said. The students were stopped on Sunset Avenue and officers detected a strong scent of alcohol. The roofs and trunks of the automobiles had been scratched, so officers arrested Curry for both malicious destruction of property valued at more than $250, as well as with disorderly conduct.

"Officers also discovered at small amount of a class D substance on Curry as well," Lyons said. Curry was charged with possession of a class D drug.

On Monday, it was reported that counterfeit bills had been given as change at a HASA CASA event. Two students reported receiving $10 bills with the exact same serial number. Other bills with the same serial numbers have been used at both Dunkin' Donuts on Commonwealth Avenue and at a gas station on Northampton Road.

According to Lyons, that matter was still under investigation.

The UMPD is continuing to investigate graffiti across campus, including racist and sexist graffiti in Gorman Residence Hall and flyers posted about the 1997 death of junior computer science major Adam Prentice at the Morrill Greenhouse. Also under investigation is a rape that allegedly occurred last Wednesday at 5:30 p.m. near the Campus Center Pond.

"Some individuals have come forward with information," Lyons said, "and we're always interested in more information, as the matter is still under investigation."

Indian victims desperately in need

UM students seek help through funding

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

The Indian Students' Association is asking for help from students in their attempt to help victims of one of the worst recorded cyclones in recent history.

The graduate student organization, through the Red Cross, is collecting contributions for the cyclone relief fund in the Campus Center today through Nov. 12. They are urging all students to take part in making relief measures available to the victims of the cyclone.

Many districts in the Indian state of Orissa were recently hit by a devastating cyclone, which entailed heavy winds and rains. The aftermath of the cyclone has left as many as 10,000 people dead and millions of others fighting to survive, according to the Red Cross. It was difficult to determine an official death figure because relatives had already cremated or buried their loved ones before rescue workers arrived.

Corpses are continuing to be pulled from ponds and roadsides as rescue workers struggle to clear the area and assist the individuals still alive. Millions of people have been devastated by the disaster, leaving an estimated 7.5 million stranded and homeless and making it impossible to contact 4.5 million people due to communication and transportation blockages.

Nine million people have yet to see any relief in the ten affected coastal districts. According to information distributed by the Indian Students' Association, one individual affected by the cyclone said, "Those who died were lucky. At least they don't have to go through the misery we are facing here with no water, food or shelter. If there is hell, its here."

In an attempt to help victims living in the 300-mile area hit by the natural disaster, the UMass Indian Students' Association joins more than a dozen other Indian-American and mainstream organizations donating to the relief fund.

The damages caused by the storm to Orissa, one of India's poorest states, is estimated to be $3.5 billion. The economy of the state has been concluded as "seriously destroyed" by Vladimir Sakharov, a United Nations representative. The U.N. has already given donations totaling $1.8 million and is now asking for an additional $50 million from donors to help aid in the relief and rehabilitation of the area.

Nightclub returns to UM as Skybox opens its doors tonight in Campus Center

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The Skybox, the University of Massachusetts' new on-campus nightclub, will open its doors tonight for its first show.

The club, which is currently the second-largest live music venue in Western Massachusetts, came about after a full year of research and organization. The need for an on-campus nightclub was established after The Hatch, located in the Campus Center, closed its doors to musical acts in 1995. The Hatch was one of the only places on campus that played live music acts and closed down because of structural damage due to termites. As opportunities for musical acts on campus dwindled, surveys noted that student dissatisfaction with the current social programs on campus increased.

During the same time, the Pearl Street Nightclub and Club Metro in Northampton struggled with difficulties as college-aged students mixed with the older crowd that also frequented the nightclubs. In addition, only roughly half of the students living on the UMass campus owned cars, while the other half frequently relied on the on-campus bus system for transportation. As a trial run, The Skybox Entertainment Group, a group of UMass students, produced two shows last semester to gauge student response to the possibility of an on-campus nightclub. The first show, last February, featuring Hurricane Dave and Joint Custody, sold out. In addition, The Skybox also put on a second show in April with Mary's First and Tave Hu, and co-hosted Fill the Hill. The event was held in conjunction with Orchard Hill and Central Area Governments, and drew over 3,000 students. Fill the Hill was held May 1 of last year and featured twelve bands performing on three stages. Following these events, an additional survey was distributed to patrons of the shows that yielded nearly unanimous support to bring back a nightclub to the campus. The Skybox is now a student-run and student-operated business that must be self-sufficient for two years in order to establish themselves permanently.

According to Mike Gray, event coordinator for The Skybox, the organization is attempting to supply students with activities in a safe environment. Basically, the Skybox will allow students to "have something to do during the night," Gray said.

Gray explained that the club has already planned out events for the remainder of the semester. "Sensual Thursdays," dance nights every Thursday featuring Boston DJ Wal-Gee spinning both hip-hop and reggae, will begin this week.

The Skybox plans to showcase local bands as well as upcoming acts, Gray explained. The venue will also feature UMass bands. Gray said he hopes that performing at The Skybox will "give them [the bands] an in into the music business."

According to Gray, the Skybox is prepared for this week's events. "Everything is really coming together," he said.

The Skybox is located on the eleventh floor of the Campus Center. Tonight will showcase the music of acts including Rane, Almost Speechless and Traveling Matt. Doors open at 7 p.m. and the bands will begin to play at 8 p.m.

Hillel House remembers "Night of Broken Glass"

By Anna Faktorovich
Collegian Correspondent

In remembrance of the "Night of broken glass," University of Massachusetts community members gathered last night at the Hillel House for a reading and viewing of a movie. Yesterday marked the 61st anniversary of the night that Jews call Kristallnacht. Literally meaning "glass night," the November date was one of the first of many Nazi assaults on the Jewish people and is recognized as a day to mourn for lives lost during the Holocaust.

The focus of the evening was on Jews during the Nazi regime. The movie was entitled America and the Holocaust and discussed the role of America and Americans in the WWII era. The movie concentrated on Nazi and American anti-Semitism. Speaker Donne Shuster read from several sources, including "The Victims," from a book chapter entitled "1938: The Night of Broken Glass."

The Hillel House was set up to encourage those in attendance to actively participate in the remembrance. The observers were led by ladder down a narrow stairway, which came to a door, followed by a hallway of candles. The walls were covered with signs stating "Never Forget," and "Those who do not remember the past are condemned to repeat it." As Shuster said, on the walls were pictures of distorted bodies of "Jews in these hellish conditions" that "preserved their human likeness."

One quote stood alone on the wall: "The Nazis intended the destruction of Jewish life to be total and permanent. Jews were to have been removed from history and memory. In the memorial we create a marker for the six million – a place to grieve for the victims and the destruction of their culture – a place to give them an everlasting name.

The movie gave an account of several individual Jews and the history of the German and American victimization by "calculated bureaucratic delays" segregation and extinction.

During the Nazi regime, the movie said, "it was the dream of every Nazi's victim to immigrate to the U.S."

The movie showed an American anti-Semitic slogan that portrayed the Statue of Liberty with the quotation under it reading "Thou Shalt Not Enter." It was further said in the movie that the overall policy of the U.S. was to keep the Jews or immigrants out to protect American jobs.

In the late 1930s and early 1940s newspapers, radio programs and speakers publicly denounced immigrants, among whom Jews were the majority, as a "threat to national security" or as "spies and traitors" who were to be avoided. The general attitude of American media was one of "obstruction of Jewish immigration," according to the movie.

Shuster explained that part of the remembrance of the Holocaust is the effort to prevent future acts of genocide and to keep in mind the connections between Jewish people.

"The individual Jew must appreciate that he does not act alone, but within his people, within the community which is close to him in character and task," Shuster said.

Anniversary of fall of Berlin Wall

By William Drozdiak
Washington Post

BERLIN – Germans celebrated the 10th anniversary of the fall of the Berlin Wall yesterday with a profusion of parties, concerts and high-powered ceremony that recaptured the giddy exuberance of Nov. 9, 1989, and reminded the country of the lingering tensions that have thwarted the full reunification of its eastern and western halves.

Germans seemed eager to set aside their differences for a night of revelry to mark their joyous reconciliation 10 years ago, when Communist border guards from East Germany suddenly lifted all barriers to travel to the west.

Despite a steady drizzle, tens of thousands of people gathered near the Brandenberg Gate yesterday evening to hear rock, folk and classical musicians perform on five stages erected on the former death strip that once divided East and West Berlin. The Russian cellist Mstislav Rostropovich, who turned up 10 years ago to play a Bach suite, gave an encore performance last night in the company of a German rock group, the Scorpions.

In an emotional scene at the Reichstag, Germany's newly refurbished parliament building, former president George Bush, former Soviet president Mikhail Gorbachev and former German chancellor Helmut Kohl exchanged words of admiration and reminisced about the difficulties they managed to surmount in peacefully defusing four decades of Cold War.

Looking back on his four years as president, Bush said "in many ways no situation was as dicey as the one we all faced" when the East German Communist leadership bungled an announcement of plans to loosen travel restrictions for their citizens and thousands of East Germans began pouring across the wall. "In the back of my mind, I worried about a crackdown of hardliners," Bush said. "We had a major question: Will the army intervene? Might we have another Prague Spring on our hands," when Warsaw Pact tanks rolled into Czechoslovakia in 1968 to put down a democratic movement by that country's Communist rulers.

Bush recalled his reaction when the first scenes from Berlin were broadcast on television in the United States 10 years ago last night. "It was a surreal sight, almost as though Dali had painted it," he said. "Then came the realization of what we were witnessing. The dam had been breached and freedom was literally cascading over the wall."

Gorbachev said that by the time the wall fell he had already reached the conclusion that the democratic rights of Eastern Europe, as well as East Germany, should be recognized and that their demands for freedom would have to be met, if at all possible, without bloodshed.

But Gorbachev did not shirk from criticizing his German hosts for what he saw as a short-sighted attitude in the jail sentence upheld on appeal Monday against Egon Krenz, the last East German leader, who opened the wall. And he also chided the German leadership for not inviting any of East Germany's former Communist rulers to the ceremony.

have observed anyone fitting the description.

UMPD Spokesman Jim Lyons said that the matter was still under investigation.

He refused to comment on whether or not the assault was sexual in nature.

It is the second consecutive Tuesday where an assault has been reported in the past eight days. Last Tuesday, a student reported being sexually assaulted near the Campus Center Pond at 6 p.m. The victim indicated that she had been grabbed from behind and forced to the ground. In last week's case, the man wore a ski mask. The attacker fled towards North Pleasant Street after the attack.

Last week's attacker was described as being a white male with a medium to muscular build. Aside from the ski mask, the attacker also wore a black sweatshirt and blue jeans.

Lyons said that it is possible the two assaults are related, but no connection has been established.

Police are seeking information about both attacks, asking anyone with information to contact the UMass Police Detective Bureau at 545-0893 or at the TIPS line at 577-TIPS (8477).

Clinton answers questions posed by public via Internet

By Edwin Chen
Los Angeles Times

WASHINGTON – There's no need to store food if you plan to be in the United States when the new millennium dawns.

The chances of a peace agreement between Israel and the Palestinians are good – "better than 50-50."

And future world leaders will have to deal with "miniaturized" weapons of mass destruction that do not rely on missiles as the delivery mechanism.

Expressing his views on a wide range of topics, Bill Clinton Monday night became the first president ever to participate in a fully interactive, online chat session, as some 50,000 Internet users logged on from around the world to see and hear his remarks.

And for more than 90 minutes, the man who openly confesses to being "technologically challenged" chatted up a storm, appearing at once to be fascinated and bemused by a technology that he has fostered through his policies but does not personally embrace.

Indeed, Clinton repeatedly referred to the historic session as simply a "press conference," and it was easy to see why.

All he had to do was sit on the stage – before cameras, of course – and answer questions that came in over the transom, screened and then posed by a moderator.

Someone else typed his answers.

The event was hosted by the Democratic Leadership Council, a centrist organization that Clinton once chaired, and by Excite@Home, a global media and technology company based in Redwood City, Calif.

The president was joined by five Democratic officials from their home bases around the country, including Maryland Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend and San Jose, Calif., Mayor Ron Gonzales, although a glitch prevented Gonzales from being seen or heard until almost an hour into the session.

The other Democrats who participated in the session were New Hampshire Gov. Jeanne Shaheen, Wisconsin state Sen. Antonio Riley and Bethlehem, Pa., Mayor Don Cunningham.

A public apology

My mistake.

I hadn't realized just how sensitive the Student Government Association could be. Apparently, after I wrote about them last week, they were so put off by my words that they discussed my column during their weekly meeting. One could, if one was cynical, wonder why they were discussing Daily Collegian columns and not any of the actual business before them, but that would be wrong.

What would be right and proper is for me to apologize to the entire SGA, as I have to admit that, looking back on what I wrote, I wasn't as clear as I meant to be in some of my points. Some of my facts and figures weren't as clearly defined as I had meant for them to be.

Sam Wilkinson

And so, to the entire gathered SGA, through my weekly column, I apologize. I was wrong.

See, when I wrote that the "SGA, on a good year, represents nine percent of the student body," I was wrong. What I meant to say is that the SGA leadership, on a good year, represents nine percent of the student body.

After reading my column, the SGA correctly pointed out that 16.8 percent of the UMass student body voted in last year's election for President and Trustee. SGA people can now smugly grin with the knowledge that many more students vote for the SGA leadership than I claimed. Apparently, staggering past election totals significantly, some 3,809 students came out to vote. And while that is a tremendous voter turnout, and one that is awful impressive, obviously those 3,809 students weren't all voting for Jeff and Seth.

Contend if you will, but Jeff Howe, the president of the SGA, won his election after receiving 828 undergraduate votes, while Trustee Seth Avakian won his after receiving 869 graduate and undergraduate votes. UMass had an enrollment of 17,137 undergraduate students last spring, and 22,672 total students, according to UMass, which means that Jeff won after receiving the support of approximately 4.83 percent of the undergraduate population of the University of Massachusetts. Meanwhile, Avakian did slightly worse, winning only the support of 4.41 percent of the entire UMass student body.

Combined, they received the votes of 9.24 percent of the UMass student body. Except, in actuality, they didn't. The figure of 9.24 percent was arrived at only after voting percentages were simply added together. But it can, unfortunately for the SGA, be assumed that at least a few of the people that voted for Howe also voted for Avakian, which means that the percentage of students who voted for them begins to drop.

And speaking of which, whatever happened to the election losers? Jim Eltringham, who was running for president, got 743 votes, or 4.33 percent of the total student population of UMass. Eltringham, however, lost. As did Malika Tafawa, a candidate for trustee, after winning only 819 votes, or 3.61 percent of the UMass vote.

The funny thing is, if we were to take Howe and Avakian, their total would be 1,697, and Eltringham and Tafawa, their total would be 1,592, and the grand total would be 3,259 total votes, meaning that, essentially, these four candidates absolutely dominated the competition.

Now, for the students who voted for the other President and Trustee candidates – Eltringham and Tafawa included – their votes, in the end, didn't count. 3,809 students may have voted in the SGA elections, but any vote that wasn't for a winning candidate doesn't count. They don't matter. They are now just blips on a computer screen on pieces of paper to be recycled.

That means that there were 550 students who didn't vote for Howe and Avakian. And there were also the 1,592 students that voted for Eltringham and Tafawa, and together, they equal 2,142 students of the grand total of 3,809 students that voted altogether. This is only interesting because it means that Avakian and Howe represent 1,667 votes of the UMass students, or a grand total of 7.35 percent of the UMass student body. This is, of course, assuming that all 22,672 students who were on campus at that time are considered, and this is then assuming that every person who voted for Howe didn't vote for Avakian. If there are people who did vote for both Howe and Avakian, the number of students they legitimately represent begins to fall and could end up falling all the way to 4.41 percent of the student body, as Avakian had more votes that Jeff did, but maybe they shared all 828 voters who supported Howe.

All of this, all of the facts and figures and percents and numbers mean that, now, I must apologize again. I apologize for apologizing to the SGA. I generously said that, on a good year, the president and the trustee of the SGA represents nine percent of the UMass student body, and I was wrong. This year, they only represent 7.35 percent of the student body, and that is assuming that Avakian and Howe shared no votes.

Why the SGA, in all of their supposed brilliance, decided to waste its good time talking about a column I wrote, I do not know. Why one ignorant student stood up to mention that I was born and raised in West Virginia, I do not know. Why the SGA passed a motion that involved me, I do not know. But I am almost sure that the few students who did vote in the SGA elections voted for students whom they felt would best represent them, and by represent I mean accomplish things.

So while I may have been out of line to suggest that attempting to secure one ATM for Southwest did not attempt to secure enough ATMs for the campus, I am not out of line in suggesting that students didn't vote for SGA representatives who would be petty and time wasting.

Seth and Jeff, who are actually two very nice and competent individuals, do not shoulder as much of the blame for this incompetence as do the senators who passed a motion to discuss what I wrote, and the others who stood up to support it.

There are so many important issues that the SGA could be tackling during their weekly meetings, and instead they are wasting time talking about some columnist in the Daily Collegian. I wrote in my column last week that if the SGA could get voter numbers up, they might earn the respect of students, and, upon reflection, I was wrong.

The SGA doesn't need to get more votes to be respected as a campus political organization. Rather, if the SGA wasn't an organization more concerned about saving their own face than doing good things for students, they might be respected as a political organization. My mistake.

Letters to the Editor

Privatization: everyone loses

To the editor:

As a life-long member of the Amherst community, thirty plus of those years as a University of Massachusetts/Amherst employee, I wish to voice my opposition to the privatization of University related services.

Privatization would cause many of the employees of our community, such as those who work in the Textbook Annex, University Store, Health Services, Food Services, ad infinitum to lose a substantial part of their present incomes (some of whom can barely sustain their homes now, especially those employees on the lower edge of the pay scale or those who are single income employees). Because of privatization people might lose their jobs and would have to rely on social services such as food stamps and subsidized housing.

The burden of privatization falls not only on the lowered incomes and decreased benefits of some employees but would also fall on the "professionals" and skilled laborers/trades people who would become the chief tax payers – people who live in Amherst as I do and people who live in all the surrounding towns.

Many of these people work at UMass with me. We hail not only from Massachusetts, but other New England states as well. No matter where we live, though, we are members of the University of Massachusetts and call this campus our work "home." We are a community. We care about one another: students, faculty, staff and so many others. Without students we would not have our jobs/incomes. Without employees and their taxes you, the students, would not have this or any other educational institutions to attend.

For those of you students who are lucky enough to have parents sharing the cost of your education, privatization dips into their pockets, too. The higher cost of that Dunkin' Donuts coffee, the books at Barnes & Noble, the trip to the nearest doctor/hospital (don't think privatization will stop short of your Health Services) will not come cheap. The repercussions of privatization are endless.

Students and fellow staffers, faculty and trades people, show your support for your/our fellow campus community. It includes all of us. Give credit where it is due. For the staff at the Textbook Annex, the University Store, everyone everywhere we turn, share a smile, a thank you. We are in this together. The loss of any aspect of our community affects the other units.

I believe the Textbook Annex personnel, the University Store and all the service related units on this campus have performed credibly over the years. They all have my confidence that they will continue to do so. The Textbook Annex and the University Store's employees have shown this through their ability to draft a bid to run their own bookstore, which lends credence to their skills.

Each of us, together, make this community unique in Massachusetts. Now, more than ever before, let's unite toward its continued health, growth, and well-being by saying "No" to privatization. We can say no, we can stop the pirating of UMass jobs, we can continue to do best that which we know best: make UMass services the best for everyone, not just a few.

The trustees will meet the employees/unions today. E-mail or write to your chancellor and/or the Board of Trustees. Join me in saving so vital a part of our campus community.

SGA is misunderstood

To the editor:

This letter is in response to the editorial "The SGA needs to shape up" published in the Daily Collegian on Nov. 3. He assumed that the reason why students do not vote in SGA elections is because the SGA makes a mockery of itself. Many students do not vote because they don't know what the SGA is or does, or they don't have the time. Other, unfortunately just don't care.

Mr. Wilkinson's complaint focused too much on the issue of ATMs in Southwest. We try to solve problems in all the living areas as they come up. If Mr. Wilkinson attended meetings, he would know that. For example, during last week's meeting the Senate voted to oppose putting a classroom in the Field Lounge in Orchard Hill.

Mr. Wilkinson compares us to a student council from junior high school, believing every senator won his or her election based on popularity. Many campaigns were hotly contested this year, and many senators ran on issues, not on popularity.

Now the news...

Okay, since more than a few of the people I know claim that UMass is more or less a bottomless hole as far as staying informed about the world is concerned, I've decided to summarize the last week or so of news for the enjoyment of the entire campus.

Bit o' News #1 – Microsoft, the world's largest abuser of market share lost its court battle with the world's second largest abuser of market share: the US government. What this decision means is that, well, that Bill Gates will have to hire a few more lawyers to appeal the decision until such time that the government gives up and learns to live with the Windows operating system, regardless of the year that is placed after it.

Bit o' News #2 – Presidential front-runner, George W. Bush managed to identify only one of the leaders of four foreign countries. Democrats are using this occurrence as a reason why Bush – who has little international experience – should not be elected while Republicans are using it as an example of "gotcha" journalism whereby the candidate is made to look foolish because of questions asked on the spot. Of course, the American people are viewing Bush as someone amazing because they certainly don't know Pervaiz Musharraf, Atal Behari Vajpayee, or any of the other leaders that he missed, thus they have decided that, in fact, Bush might be a good idea because frankly, all those guys who do know the people listed above haven't done all that great of a job.

Chris Collins

Bit o' News #3 – Australia decided that it was not willing to change its head of state from the Queen of England to a president. The after affects of this decision were mind -shattering, as many Australians asked, "Why the heck are we still following the queen of a country that stopped being a real power in the world with the First World War?" Even more Australians then asked, "Why does it matter, the monarchy doesn't do anything anymore anyway?" Ultimately, Australians proved the really don't care, showing that America's apathy towards politics is slowly spreading to the rest of the world.

Bit o' News # 4 – In California, there is a landmark trial that could decide the legality of the use of medical marijuana. Essentially, the outcome will be watched closely by those who believe that the dangers of marijuana use outweigh the pain relief that it can offer to people in great pain, those in great pain themselves, and of course, the Little Debbie corporation as the fine people at Frito-lay. But seriously, according to the New York Times, the people being brought to court used the marijuana to treat themselves after some heavy-duty AIDS and cancer treatments. I suppose, that if it was the only thing that could help them, and a full fledged doctor recommended it, I guess their actions were still very illegal as far as federal law is concerned.

Bit o' News # 5 – Bill Clinton has revealed that his residence after his term of office is over will in fact be the 1.7 million dollar house that he and Hillary purchased in New York. This move is an interesting one, because the reason for buying the house was to allow Hillary a chance to run for Senator in New York. Of course, if she wins, Bill will be all alone in the huge house. I wonder if the poor boy will be lonely?

Bit o' News # 6 – The Bone Collector was number one at the box office this weekend. This confirms three important aspects of our society: number one, people in general, like Denzel Washington, number two, Angelina Jolie is cute as a button even if she is running around in sewers and other unappealing places, number three, apparently the taste of the movie going public increased since Titanic managed to be a hit. In my opinion, these three aspects point towards the millennium becoming an amazing age of peace, prosperity, and movies not about boats sinking.

Bit o' News # 7 – Some guy was giving away free donuts and juice in lobby of my building today in hopes that I would read some of the newspapers that are going to be free for the next month. I was very happy to get the donut, and I decided that I would definitely read any paper that came with a free donut. Of course, the Collegian doesn't have enough money to give away free donuts. I guess I'll just have to read it without a free donut. That's life.

Okay, all done. That's all. You can put the paper down. Nothing more for you to see here. Turn to the comics and read those. Then do the crossword. Ah, forget it, you probably didn't read all the way to here anyway. Probably stopped reading when you saw my name attached to it. It's okay. Fine. Be that way.

History Lesson

"The domes of the new synagogue near the zoo are smoking, spitting crimson flames. You can hear the anxious roar of the lions in their cages, the laughing screech of the hyenas and monkeys on the breeze." –Michel Tracy, Histories II

Germany, Austria. The eve of Nov. 10, 1938. Sixty years ago today the organized anti-Jewish riots called Kristallnacht or "The Night of Broken Glass" occurred. "I ran to the window and saw boys and men in brown uniforms carrying bricks and torches as they marched through the street," Holocaust survivor, Marga Silberman Randall writes in her book How Beautiful We Once Were. "They were singing awful songs about Jews and, even at my young age, I knew they were going to do something very bad."

Jeremy M. Goldberg

Jews woke to the sounds of breaking glass, burning synagogues and the sounds of beatings. Over 7,000 homes, shops and businesses were vandalized, 91 Jews were killed and so began the Nazi attack against the Jewish people.

The historical justification for "The Night of Broken Glass" and the widespread attacks on the Jewish people that followed was in response to the assassination of the secretary of the German Embassy, Ernst von Roth in Paris by Polish-Jew Hershel Grynszpan. From that point on, some 30,000 Jewish boys and men were deported to the Dachau, Buchenwald and Sachsenhausen concentration camps.

Marga Silberman Randall continues, "Then the Nazis burst into our room, telling us to leave the house and that they would burn it to the ground." The terror of the innocent and the cowardice murders created utter chaos in these hours. The Jewish people became a scapegoat for the Nazi empire to capitalize their hopes for world domination. Did God exist on this night? Was there a hope for a better day?

In 1988 the German Government proclaimed in document form that Kristallnacht would now be known as Reichpogromnacht (Silberman-Randall, How Beautiful We Once Were), "the night of terror, destruction and murder."

So how far have we come in managing cultural sanity and refraining from alleviating our spite onto other people? Obviously not far enough. It has always occurred to me how necessary Holocaust education is. However, upon receiving a letter from a friend who is a Holocaust survivor, I now know for sure that it is my duty to educate others. More so, it is the responsibility of humankind to take care of its own, and with the proper education we will enable our human prosperity.

Awareness is not just the ability to listen, but to understand what you are hearing. The Holocaust took the lives of millions, embodied itself into the nightly dreams of the survivors and spread the dangers of dictatorial power. We must all be aware and clued into the current events both domestic and abroad. I will continue to educate myself and others, for I personally cannot allow what happened to the Jews of Kristallnacht and the Holocaust to happen to any person or any culture of this generation.

Getting involved in what you truly love

Soul singer Aretha Franklin said it best with the spelling out of one word, R-E-S-P-E-C-T. I don't think she had any idea what a catch phrase it would turn into. But that's what most people are looking for today in some way or another, especially racial minorities and women in the work force.

With affirmative action once again bulldozing deep lines of opposition in the latter part of the decade, it's not a question of capability or desire anymore. It's a question of making the most of your opportunities and earning your keep.

Today, more and more women and minorities are getting their foot into the door within fields that have been dominated by men since their introduction. Computer science, landscaping, business, electrical engineering and politics – are all areas being inflated with females determ. Thankfully, women across the centuries have fought for more than they were given, and rightfully so. It's the women who supported their families after their husbands died or were killed during the Revolutionary and Civil Wars. You are right to be angry when a male co-worker makes snide comments, or when an you feel yourself getting bypassed because you weren't as aggressive as you should have been or could have been.

Sportswriting; in the future for more girls

OK, so maybe I am not doing so hot in my Daily Collegian NFL picks right now. Floundering below the Mendoza line, I need to pick up the slack in the coming weeks.

But in case you haven't noticed, I am the only female among us fine group of sports gurus, or so we think. Why? I guess you could say that after almost three years, I have been here long enough to earn the slot.

Some people like to tell me they are glad to see at least one girl among the boys. Other strangers feel they can approach me in social situations and put on a tirade of why my picks are dumb. Thanks, it really makes my night.

Sports have always been a part of my life, and it has been for a growing number of American girls and women in the last 25 years. Since Title IX, which states that schools must allow an equal number of athletic teams for both genders, females have embraced the ideas of aggression and competitiveness, and what it feels like to be a member of a team.

Above getting involved in playing sports and understanding the draw to ESPN's SportsCenter, I have begun to plan my future around a career in sportswriting.

I have learned a great deal about the ways of the world in my limited experience. One of the first was that many male athletes and colleagues think you just want a quick ser step to dating them, the athletes that is. They think it's an open invitation to hand you a little smile and impress you with their athletic feats. This does not work for the majority of us, trust me.

Many remember the 1990 incident in which Boston Herald reporter Lisa Olsson was harassed by some of the New England Patriots while trying to obtain interviews with the players. I had a similar experience this past summer.

While interning at a medium-sized paper in eastern Mass., I covered a minor league baseball team and had to go into the locker room for interviews. After being informed by a kind reporter that I should knock first to let them know I was coming in, I followed his instructions and walked into the room. Standing before me were 25 men in the early twenties dressed in either a towel or half a uniform, and even a little less.

Not wanting to see anything my dad would not be proud of, I held my head high and approached the pitcher, who was very cordial and professional throughout our interview. His teammates, however, were a different story.

Chants of "drop it, drop it," began to ring around me as my cheeks took on a rosy hue. The player standing next to my interviewee squealed to the delight of his teammates, "I was just about to drop my towel until she came in!"

Needless to say, I couldn't wait to get out of there.

There have been other minor incidents to speak of, and some I have already forgotten. I once had a boss who referred to women as "broads." I haven't always been taken seriously during interviews. With the male to female ratio way off balance, many men think you are open prey for them to continually hit on you while you are doing your job. It shouldn't have to be said that when I am working, I don't want anyone telling me what they think of me.

This is not about complaining about the job and trying to drum up pity for us poor souls who like to write about sports. Not in the least. For most of us, we love the thought of being in the minority and following in the light, sandy but sure-footed steps of the small but growing number of women ahead of us.

I love getting the best seat in the house at games. I love getting to meet famous people like Pete Sampras. I love traveling to cities I have never been to before. I love most any sports, and I love to write.

Ten years ago, the Association for Women in Sports Media was introduced as a means for men and women to join and decide better methods of helping women become more effective in their careers. Today, more than 600 men and women join together in this ongoing mission.

It's hope that someday this will not be an issue at all. This is the hope of this page. And it's the hope that female sports writers will get to interview and further promote female athletes.

Growing with the industry: women

By Christine Connare
Collegian Staff

Look out men; women are breaking their way into science and technology. Over the last decade, with the outrageous popularity of computers, the technology field has been expanding at an alarming rate. With this growth more women are entering the field.

Kate Gagne, a senior computer science major, is one woman planning for a career in the field. Currently, Gagne is completing the major and searching for jobs.

"It's a really difficult field in general. There are tons of jobs out there. I've been interviewing like crazy," Gagne said.

Gagne entered the computer science program right away as a freshman. She readily admits the major is extremely difficult and the classes are challenging.

"I never had programming classes before. I found it very challenging. I didn't know the architecture of it all," Gagne said.

In her classes she says there can be a range of two to ten women, but "ten is stretching it." In her opinion the women in the major are treated exactly the same as the men.

The number of women in the computer science major is rather low compared to the number of men. Of the 350 students in the major, 39 are women. Yet, this is an increase from a few years ago.

Aside from her academic experience here at UMass, Gagne has gained valuable field experience from a position this past summer.

"I was a systems administrator at Texas Instruments in Attleboro, Mass. My duties were to allocate new PCs out on the factory floors that were Y2K compliant, along with testing the custom applications that ran on the older PCs, and made sure that they ran completely under Windows NT 4.0, and then train the users on the new system," explained Gagne.

One of the highlights of my summer was a trip to Dallas, TX, where the corporate TI is located, and I set up PCs that were responsible for shipping out the calculators that most students on this campus have today," Gagne added.

In the field, Gagne found an even ratio between the numbers of male and female employees. Her direct boss was male. However, the supervisor above him was a woman. One observation she made was that the majority of workers on the assembly floor, the unskilled labor, were men.

It is quite evident that Gagne is dedicated to her work within the computer science field.

She said, "I openly call myself a geek."

Gagne plans to graduate this May. She hopes to land a job in the computer field around the Metro Boston area. In addition, she would like a position that will allow for some flexibility when she decides to marry and have children.

UMass Dance Team moves to the beat of its own drum

The UMass Dance Team is a sell-promoted, self-coached team full of ambition and talent.

Remember when you were little and your parents forced you to take dance lessons? Did you ever wonder what may have happened if you actually stuck with it? Perhaps, you would have become the next Rockette.

Well, some people do not give up their dreams so easily. They strive for perfection – despite the grueling hours and pain required to perfect that flawless dance routine. There is a whole group of shining examples of success here at UMass. Collectively they are known as the UMass Dance Team.

Christine Connare

The dance team is a RSO here at UMass.

Their goal is to provide entertainment and support to the UMass community. The dancers take center court prior to home football and football games, as well as other school events such as Family Day.

The team of 16 ladies has raised most of their own funds, created their own costumes, and choreographed their own routines. The team, because they do not receive athletic funding, does not have a coach or an abundance of equipment to work with. It all rests on its own shoulders.

"The team is self governed," said co-captain Ryann Delsignore. "We [the captains] act as financial advisors."

Yet, the entire team is consulted for all decision making.

Over the past three years the team has raised over $55,000, completely on its own. It needs the funds to support an annual trip to the NCA Collegiate Nationals in Daytona Beach, Florida. The dancers make the money through an interesting mix of events. Yankee Candle sales. Avon products and selling lollipops have all helped send those dancers to Florida. The team has even cleaned up frat houses after parties – collecting bottles and cashing in on the deposits.

"We don't stop fundraising," said Delsignore.

When the dancers are not busy raising money, they can be found practicing in Curry Hicks Cage. They spend between three and four hours a night, four nights per week practicing. Fall semester is spent primarily practicing for the home games and university functions. The spring semester is when things get crazy. Aside from preparing for school functions, the team must develop and practice for Nationals in April.

"We work so hard for the competition, but it is so worth it," Delsignore said.

These girls are certainly going places. The team has captured national attention at the National Cheerleading Association's (NCA) competitions in Daytona Beach, Fl. Over the past four years the UMass Dance Team has placed in the top ten. After the preliminary dance competition, the team took to the beach to compete.

"That is the most exhilarating, rushing feeling ever, thousands of people out on the beach," said Delsignore. "All the cameras are on you."

The competition is aired on three major networks – USA, CBS, and FOX.

In addition, the team was featured on the summer 1999 cover of Dance Spirit's In Motion. As a result of the recent publicity, the team now has a clothing sponsorship. The girls no longer need to spend hours studding their own costumes or worry about not having costumes. Two years ago the team traveled to Daytona without costumes. The costumes were delivered to them a day before they performed.

"It was horrible going without costumes," said Delsignore.

The members of the dance team do not have to be dance majors. They simply need to be committed and willing to devote a great deal of time and effort to the team. The size of the team has slightly increased over the past few years, from twelve last year to sixteen this year.

"We figured if we could have the talent, why not take it?" said Delsignore.

The young women on this team certainly devote a huge part of their lives to the dance team, and to the UMass community itself. One former dance team member now performs as a Rockette. Other former members dance in various productions in New York City.

If you want to check out the team for yourself, go to the next home basketball game.

Boy meets world

Think Melanie Griffith and the 1980s film, "Working Girl."

The image of the world of business generally consisted of big, important men sitting back in their massive, corner offices, years of hard work to their backs as they wait for others to answer to their beck and call. The image was blurred by a furious bustle of talk and walk as heavy oak doors attempted to block out their owner's yelling and screaming at lower, idiotic workers.

Secretaries were planted right in the middle of the mud, typing up letters and serving coffee while sneaking conversation about who was sleeping with whom in the office, all amidst the shoulder pads within their power suits. The image also included menial schmucks pinned to their encompassing cubicles with 18 piles of papers cluttering their desks.

And if you remember, the only female executive, Catherine, was considered to be difficult to say the least.

That's what Dave Wurtzel imagined when he began taking School of Management classes here at UMass three years ago. An accounting major, the freshman originally from Nashua, NH liked math and other related courses in high school, and thought it would be a perfect fit for him.

Plodding through the major, Wurtzel earned his way to an internship last summer with a Big Five accounting firm, Ernst & Young at their Boston firm. From his classes and through word-of-mouth, he had also began to learn that the business world was not as male-oriented as he had originally thought.

"I envisioned adult males 30, 40, 50-years-old, mostly men working together," said Wurtzel. "But the Big Five has been trying to increase role of women."

Hired within the auditing department at E & Y, Wurtzel was in for a major shock on his first day of orientation. Knowing that many firms were making a conscious effort to hirer more minorities, Wurtzel expected that the new interns would be equally divided between men and women.

This did not turn out to be the case, however.

Walking into the room, Wurtzel discovered that his incoming class was comprised of 21 females and nine males. As a white male, he was a minority in such a gathering. According to Wurtzel, African-Americans and Asians comprised about 20 percent of the group.

"I expected the ratio to be about 50/50, or maybe 60/40 guys," said Wurtzel. "I was really surprised when I saw that 30 of the interns were girls."

Afterwards, the UMass senior understood firsthand why there was such an increase in women. More and more women are entering the field of business as corporations are opening up to the idea of a more equal and friendly workplace.

"It wasn't like everyone was like, 'why all girls?' said Wurtzel. "I knew they were really smart; it wasn't like they just needed women. I thought all the girls felt comfortable [in the situation, though]."

The goal for most companies and businesses, according the Wurtzel, is to have more women attain higher positions, and eventually partnerships. The only way for this to happen is for companies to hire more women now, kind of like running their own personal affirmative action, and see what unfolds for the future.

"I know it's going to take time," said Wurtzel. "But 20 years from now you will be able to see the difference, a more diverse workplace."

Another important step that needs to happen is that companies must be able to build retention with minorities. In the example of Ernst & Young, about 45 to 50 percent of incoming employees are female, 20 percent of managers are female while just two percent make up the partnership. More flexible work hours for both men and women are being implemented into the work schedule.

"Flexible work schedules are becoming a larger deal," said Wurtzel. "I worked with a guy who wanted to stay home with his kids."

A more subtle method of holding onto more women is as simple as improving the decor of the office. Sure, some offices are stuffy and filled with Dilbert cubicles and black leather waiting rooms. But others are making a conscious effort to invite women and minorities to feel welcome.

According to Wurtzel, "They are making a big deal – it's very non-gender. They tend to go towards the neutral, or off-white schemes."

Hopefully, women will not have to pull a Melanie Griffith and pretend she is qualified for the higher position. And she will be respected for her position and ability to get things done because she will be qualified on her own merits.

UM senior tops on dance stage

By Christine Connare
Collegian Staff

When UMass senior Ryann Delsignore saw The Nutcracker at four-years-old, she decided she wanted to be on stage dancing. Ever since she has been practicing dance steps. Today Delsignore is co-captain of the UMass dance team. In her fourth year on the team she still enjoys the thrill of competition and the challenge of dance itself.

"There's a big difference between The Nutcracker and the L.A. Laker Girls – that's what we are more like," said Delsignore.

Delsignore, although studying Communications here at UMass, has always been interested and involved with dance. She has taken classes at the Boston Ballet and later at a private studio in her hometown of Mansfield, Mass.

Her experience at the dance studio, "helped a lot with discipline, and a lot with life," she said. The experience helped Delsignore to expand talents, beyond that relating strictly to ballet.

As a freshman, Delsignore was unable to find a dance class first semester. Frustrated, she auditioned for the dance team, and made it. For the past three years she has traveled to NCAA Nationals in Florida with the team. For two consecutive years she has been named All-American.

Along with her co-captain Melissa Currie, Delsignore takes on a number of responsibilities. Currie and Delsignore serve as financial advisors and mentors for younger dancers. As a member of the dance team she feels a great obligation to the UMass community. Aside from providing some school spirit at home games, the dance team also takes part in other events. The team has appeared at hockey games, painting faces on the sidelines. Recently the team participated in Family Day here at the University. The team walked onto the field in their new uniforms.

"I felt like a celebrity for a minute," said Delsignore, "The fans keep us going."

Delsignore will be graduating this year. Her ideal job includes a position in an advertising firm in New York City (putting that communications degree to work) and at the same time dance for the New York Knicks. With her talent and ambition, she could very well accomplish this goal.

"I would love to come back to UMass in ten years and see the team win a bunch of titles and have athletic funding," said Delsignore.

She Stoops to open tomorrow

COURTESY THEATER UMASS

Laura Lowry, Colin Metz and Andrew Whitehead star in the Theater departments production of She Stoops to Conquer, opening tomorrow.

In the early 1770's an Irish playwright named Oliver Goldsmith needed to pay off some debts. He decided the best way to do this was to write a comedy. When Goldsmith was done he sent the play to the manager of the Theatre Royal in London. His script was immediately rejected, reportedly because of its "low" content. Goldsmith revised his work and after much travail, an arduous rehearsal period and three title changes She Stoops to Conquer was presented in 1773.

The UMass Theatre department is presenting this classic farce in the Rand Theater for the next three weekends. Faculty member Ed Golden directed the production. Golden has adapted the text so the action takes place in Historic Deerfield. Golden believes the play is adaptable to any locale or historic time in which there is a clash of generations – a major theme in the play. He originally toyed with the idea of setting the play in the 1930's or 50's. Deerfield, however, came to him as the ideal setting.

The major action of the play centers around Kate Hardcastle, a young woman who has recently returned from Boston. While she was away she learned more about "French frippery" than refined etiquette. Kate's newly attained confidence sets off a series of comic and scandalous events.

Ticket reservations can be made over the phone by calling the Fine Arts Box Office at 545-2511. The show is running Nov. 11-13, 18-20, and Dec. 2-4 at 8pm.

Skybox opens tonight

Traveling Matt will be the first band to play at the unveiling of the Skybox tonight.

Some UMass bands will be getting some groove on tonight at the new Skybox. One of them, Traveling Matt, is eager to be the first band to play at the on-campus venue this semester.

A five-piece groove/rock ensemble, Traveling Matt will be joining the lineup of Rane and Almost Speechless to celebrate the opening of the new campus club.

With their poppy lyrical melodies and danceable grooves, their original tunes are just the band to open up for headliners Rane, who have filled the Hartford Meadows three times — rivaling only that of the Dave Matthews Band.

Traveling Matt will be the first band performing at the Skybox, so be sure to get there early.

Traveling Matt will be playing at the Skybox (11th Floor Campus Center) with Almost Speechless and Rane at 8 p.m. Doors open at 7. The show is 18+.

All's not right in Pokemon world

By Robin Rauzi
Los Angeles Times

HOLLYWOOD — Children. Their attentions wander. But not fast enough to prevent Pokemon: The First Movie.

The Pokemon franchise, Japan's most popular export since the Toyota Camry, started as a Nintendo Game Boy. Its success began a TV cartoon, which began trading cards. And now, like "Rugrats," "Mighty Morphin Power Rangers" and "Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles" before it, Pokemon is a feature film.

For kids already indoctrinated into the cult of Pokemon, the movie may add something to the ever-growing mythology surrounding the characters. For most others, it will be an appealing diversion, though by no means an exhilarating one. For those completely on the outside (read: adults), the Pokemon world is baffling, even somewhat troubling.

The Pokemon universe is complicated; there are 151 Pokemon characters, for instance, about 20 of which make appearances in the film. The human protagonist, Ash Ketchum (voiced by Veronica Taylor), and his buddies Misty and Brock are trainers. They capture these "pocket monsters," the Pokemon, teach them, and pit them against those of rival trainers. The Pokemon is a willing gladiator. The trainer is a general — he issues the commands he hopes will win the battle. The prize: possession of the Pokemon.

Pokemon: The First Movie, subtitled "Mewtwo Strikes Back," is about a powerful Pokemon gone bad. Mewtwo, a cat-like biologically engineered Pokemon clone, has more supernatural strength than any regular Pokemon. (One of the handful of adult laughs comes from Mewtwo's decidedly feline character. Pathetic humans, he tells his creators, I will not serve you. I am superior to all of you.)

Superiority complex aside, Mewtwo is racked with existential angst. "Why am I here?" he says after destroying the lab where he was created. "What is my purpose?" Well ... fear leads to anger. Anger leads to hate. And hate leads to suffering, right? Mewtwo sets out to wipe the trainers and their lackey Pokemon off the face of the planet.

Great Japanese animation Pokemon is not. (Princess Mononoke is still in theaters, if that's what you're after.) Pokemon isn't even good animation, unless the standard of measure is the crude LCD graphics of a Game Boy. The characters are flat — apparently deliberately so, to resemble the TV drawings. But unlike the TV program, the film at least contains movement that is somewhat fluid, and director Kunihiko Yuyama creates surprising angles and unexpected extreme close-ups.

The film has, however, been "Americanized." Producer Norman J. Grossfeld, voice director Michael Haigney and John Touhey essentially wrote an American script that lays like a template over the 75-minute Japanese movie. It's impossible to tell whether Yuyama's vision of the film remains intact. The most obvious change is a jarringly bad pop soundtrack that even second-graders can tell doesn't suit the film.

But it seems the Americans have made other, more subtle changes. Writer Stephanie Strom made a good case in Sunday's New York Times that the "Pokemon" TV show is steeped in Japanese values: responsibility, empathy, respect for elders, cooperation, obedience and humility. One wonders what happened to the film, then. There are no elders present or even mentioned. Only the Pokemon are obedient. There's very little teamwork between Ash and buddies. To the contrary, Ash hollers at the wicked Mewtwo, "I won't let you do that!" That's pure, undiluted American individualism.

But like most children's entertainment, the "Pokemon" themes seem disturbingly unexamined. Aspirations for world domination aside, Mewtwo objects to the enslavement of Pokemon to their trainers. Viewed in that context, Ash's declaration that he cares for his Pokemon seems eerily antebellum. The whole competition between trainers starts to look like cockfighting, or worse.

But elementary schoolers, for whom the world is still fairly two-dimensional, probably won't be bothered by such thoughts. It's the parents who might be, as they take their kid back to the theater for the fourth time to get that last "exclusive" Pokemon trading card. They will look at their child's overstuffed binder of cards, the well-worn Game Boy, and wonder if they've been had. And then the title may start to seem like a threat: Pokemon: The First Movie.

Are the Foo Fighters rock 'n' roll's saviors?

The ever-changing personnel of the Foo Fighte[illegible] Hawkins and core member Dave Grohl on the far left.

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

FOO FIGHTERS

It's 1999, a decade is quickly coming to an end and we are left to reflect on the state of rock and roll. Even though the "who will save rock and roll?" question arises every six months or so, this is a rare opportunity for retrospection. Grunge came, revolutionized music, and left as quickly. Kurt Cobain has been dead for half a decade. Sure, Creed is desperately trying to cling on as long as they can, and Pearl Jam is still around (no thanks to the disappointing sales of last year's Yield), but it's over. So, what are we left with? Well, to be honest, electronic metal. Bands like Korn, Limp Bizkit, and even Godsmack are taking over rock and roll not only in terms of album sales, but also in radio play.

Switch now to the Foo Fighters, founded by former Nirvana drummer Dave Grohl. Their wonderful, Grammy nominated, 1998 album The Colour and the Shape blended hard hitting guitar riffs and Dave Grohl's wailing voice with the occasional ballad (see "Walking after You," eventually remixed and released on The X-Files soundtrack) for the perfect hard/soft mix.

With their new album, Nothing Left to Lose, the Foo Fighters have evolved and oddly arrived at something much more melodic. The power chords, the frenzy of energy and the teen angst are still there; they are merely refined into a more modest, slightly subdued album. Here, the group seems focussed on creation, on ripping things apart and putting them together. Track titles like "Learn to Fly" and "Aurora" suggest a sort of galactic wandering through the sky and the stars.

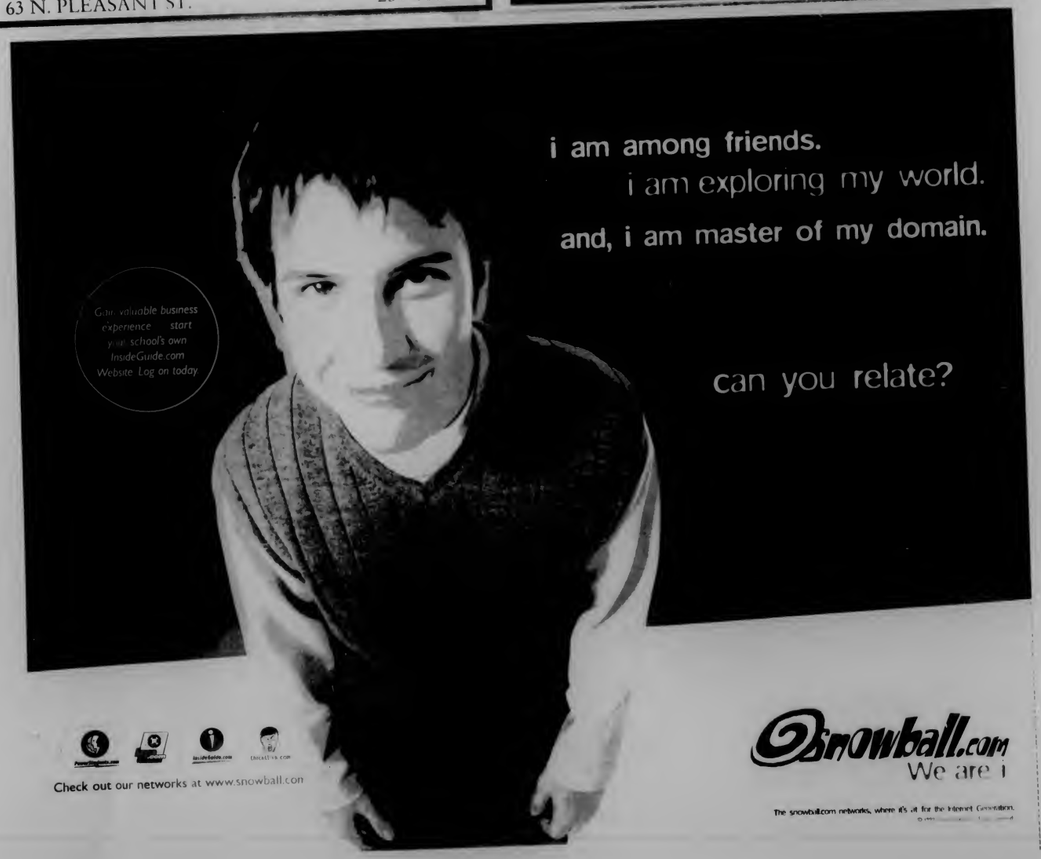
The first track "Stacked Actors" reintroduces the direct drums, bass, guitar approach used by the band so successfully. It's what has become expected from the Foo Fighters – hard hitting drums met by layers of distorted guitar, but not what is indicative of the rest of the album. Grohl screams about stacks of dead actors who all died blonde and demands the truth.

"Breakout" uses a typically catchy, notoriously grinding Foo Fighters' chorus as a throw back to the bands punk roots. Think of it as "Monkeywrench Part II." The track serves as an early turning point for the album as Grohl cries for a (musical) breakout pleading, "I don't want to look like that."

"Learn to Fly," the album's first single, is evidence of a departure for the group. Grohl actually changes the notes that he sings – an improvement that runs throughout the entire disc. As a result, the song is misinterpreted as more "poppy." In reality, the energetic refrains are simply joined by subtle (soft) guitar solos. The lyrics point to this change. "looking for a new revolution cause this one's a lie." Don't talk to the Foo Fighters about post-punk.

Four power guitar chords run through "Gimme Stiches." At first, they dominate the song, but slowly they fade amid a fusion of sound. This is also a track that hints at urgency. "It's now or never," as Grohl waits to get his blood on you.

Track five, "Generator," is probably the closest the Foo Fighters will ever come to writing a love song. Dressed up by a nice synthesizer effect, the song bursts with an enthusiasm and power of, well, a motor. Still, it's hard to believe that only one person, even a female, could infuse the Foo's music with its fuel.



At almost six minutes, "Aurora" is unusually long for the group, but proves to be absolutely wonderful. What starts as a lone guitar solo quickly becomes layers of them revolving around the image of falling stars. The song is majestic as even Grohl makes "hell yeah" sound dreamy.

"Next Year" continues the trend of a new Foo Fighter sound as well as the image of nighttime and stars. The song seems tailor-made for instant radio success. Grohl indulges in the ballad, dressing it up with soft percussions and an acoustic guitar. And even as Grohl hovers disillusioned above his bizarre world, he promises a triumphant return.

Indeed, he lives up to the promise with this album. Grohl, who at least helped define the term teen angst with Nirvana, refuses to give up the notion and perhaps that's a good thing. Grohl goes further though. He takes his raw energy and crafts it into eleven well-written tracks. He doesn't have the answers to a music void, but Nothing Left to Lose proves he's at least searching. Mellower? Yes. Soft? Not in the least. It's not perfect, but it is a talented, hard working musician giving it everything he has. B+

In a significant milestone for the campus, The Skybox opens its doors from atop the university's campus center. Tonight the club brings Rane back to UMass after drawing over 3,000 at their headlining performance at last semester's Fill the Hill '99. Since that time, the very distinct and refreshing sounds of Rane were heard three times at the Meadows Music Theater in Hartford this summer (matching only the Dave Matthews Band) along with receiving their third consecutive Hartford music award. Also on the same bill, Almost Speechless, who recently came just a few people shy of selling out the Iron Horse see the pregnancy of lead singer Kay Hanley perform at the Paradise.

Sensual Thursdays kick off tomorrow night in classy style with DJ Wal-Gee, spinning hip-hop and reggae. The UMass-based Wal-Gee has performed at many prestigious clubs throughout the Northeast. Some may remember Wal-Gee from his days spinning at Club Metro in Northampton before the City urged clubs to produce only 21+ shows. If dancing is not your thing then look for singer-songwriter Mark Erelli wooing another Iron Horse crowd. Otherwise UMass alumni band Buffalo Tom are at the Middle East downstairs while The Dubnicks and Ms Pigeon are up. Wilco is at Avalon.

UMass kicks off the weekend and Amherst College caps it off with three incredible shows. The first, on Friday night, brings Northampton locals Fountains of Wayne to their Alumni Gym. Known for their critically acclaimed Radiation Vibe debut album released on the Smashing Pumpkin's Scratchie Records label a few years back, they are presently touring in support of yet another impressive release in Utopia Parkway. For those of you in Boston for the weekend, Letters to Cleo, vacant from the stage since the pregnancy of lead singer Kay Hanley perform at the Paradise.

On Saturday, Amherst College hosts They Might Be Giants while Chris Cornell is at Boston's Orpheum. Michael Glabicki of Rusted Root plays solo at Pearl Street's clubroom.

Then on Sunday the Get Up Kids invade Amherst, while Widespread Panic touches the Orpheum stage.

Maroon and White closes out fall slate at Princeton tourney

By Jen Cormier
Collegian Staff

For the Massachusetts men's tennis team, the NCAA ITA Regional Championships didn't quite provide the fairy tale ending to the fall season that the squad wanted.

Coach Judy Dixon sent seniors Parsa Samii and Marco Casesa to represent the Maroon and White in Princeton, NJ. The five-day tournament featured some of the best players in the Northeast.

Despite high expectations, the Minutemen did not fare well in the tournament. Samii went down in the first round of the 128-player singles draw, while the duo of Samii and Casesa also suffered a first round doubles loss.

Heading into the tournament, Dixon emphasized the valuable experience of playing in a high-caliber tournament such as the ITF. While the seniors' first round losses are disappointing to the team, Dixon feels that Samii and Casesa benefit from having the opportunity to play at a high quality level. She feels that the pressure of the tournament will help them in the spring, when they face less foreboding Atlantic 10 competitors in less intense situations.

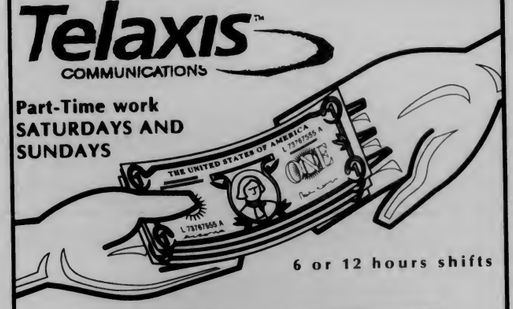
While the fall campaign may have ended on a somewhat lackluster note, the tournament results are overshadowed by an impressive season that was characterized by strong individual performances and immense team unity. The Minutemen overpowered nearly all of their opponents on the road to an undefeated 5-0 dual match record.

Sophomore standout Steve Priseo lived up to expectations, racking up a flawless 4-0 dual match record. Meanwhile, freshman Will Shaw never ceased to impress his fellow teammates, displaying on-court poise and maturity on the way to an admirable 5-0 dual match record.

Dixon is especially elated with the team's fall showing, considering the obstacle they were forced to overcome from day one of the season — the loss of senior co-captain Bo Navarro due to academic reasons.

"We set the bar pretty high at the beginning of the year," Dixon commented. "Given that we were missing [Navarro], I think that we overachieved."

Navarro is expected to return to the line-up for the spring season. However, while the addition of Navarro adds a great deal of depth to the roster, the Minutemen have a spring slate of opponents that should prove to be much more challenging than the fall schedule.



The men's tennis team officially closed the book on the fall season and will reopen for business in early February.

Maroon and White closes out fall slate at Princeton tourney

By Jen Cormier
Collegian Staff

For the Massachusetts men's tennis team, the NCAA ITA Regional Championships didn't quite provide the fairy tale ending to the fall season that the squad wanted.

Coach Judy Dixon sent seniors Parsa Samii and Marco Casesa to represent the Maroon and White in Princeton, NJ. The five-day tournament featured some of the best players in the Northeast.

Despite high expectations, the Minutemen did not fare well in the tournament. Samii went down in the first round of the 128-player singles draw, while the duo of Samii and Casesa also suffered a first round doubles loss.

Heading into the tournament, Dixon emphasized the valuable experience of playing in a high-caliber tournament such as the ITF. While the seniors first round losses are disappointing to the team, Dixon feels that Samii and Casesa benefit from having the opportunity to play at a high quality level. She feels that the pressure of the tournament will help them in the spring, when they face less foreboding Atlantic 10 competitors in less intense situations.

While the fall campaign may have ended on a somewhat lackluster note, the tournament results are overshadowed by an impressive season that was characterized by strong individual performances and immense team unity. The Minutemen overpowered nearly all of their opponents on the road to an undefeated 5-0 dual match record.

Sophomore standout Steve Prisco lived up to expectations, racking up a flawless 4-0 dual match record. Meanwhile, freshman Will Shaw never ceased to impress his fellow teammates, displaying on-court poise and maturity on the way to an admirable 3-0 dual match record.

Dixon is especially elated with the team's fall showing, considering the obstacle they were forced to overcome from day one of the season — the loss of senior co-captain Bo Navarro due to academic reasons.

"We set the bar pretty high at the beginning of the year," Dixon commented, "Given that we were missing [Navarro], I think that we overachieved."

Navarro is expected to return to the line-up for the spring season. However, while the addition of Navarro adds a great deal of depth to the roster, the Minutemen have a spring slate of opponents that should prove to be much more challenging than the fall schedule.

The men's tennis team officially closed the book on the fall season and will reopen for business in early February.

Stampede by Bills leaves 'Skins looking for answers

By Tony Kornheiser
Washington Post

Sunday, bloody Sunday saw all four Washington teams go splat. The Capitals, who promised us "speed, skill and scoring" three seasons ago, lost at Carolina. The Wizards lost by 25 in New Jersey to the Nets, who hadn't won this season. Even D.C. United, the city's shining light, got blasted, 5-1, in Columbus, Ohio. It was the worst playoff loss United has ever had.

But the worst, of course, was the Redskins, who were undressed by one of the cast members of "The Magical Legend of the Leprechauns." I don't want to say Doug Flutie is small, but he gets his uniform at Gap For Kids. He sure can make big linemen look silly, though. He spins them around like dreidels.

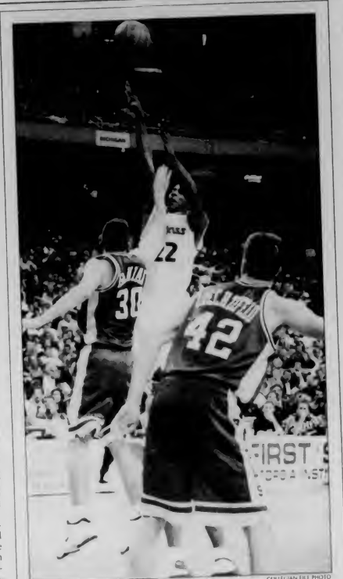
Oh, Dana, you can stop lunging now – he's gone back to Buffalo.

Here's the first rule: You can't score if you don't have the ball. The football game lasts 60 minutes, and Buffalo kept the ball for 41 of them. I've had car leases that didn't last so long. Buffalo had five sustained scoring drives, encompassing 52 plays and 28 minutes. That's not simply holding on to the ball – in some jurisdictions that's considered squatting.

The Redskins' defense could do nothing to pry the ball loose from Flutie. If Flutie needed to pass, he passed with accuracy. If he needed to run, he ran with a flourish. It's not that the Bills were unpredictable: They had 28 first-and-10 plays, and ran between the tackles on 25 of them. Buffalo's big guys were better than Washington's big guys, and Buffalo's little guy was better than everybody else. Through the first three quarters of the game – after which the game was over – Flutie was successful on nine of 12 third-down plays, and his only fourth-down play: "We were unable to stop him," Coach Norv Turner said.

Washington's only chance was to outscore him, and the Redskins opened well, going 66 yards in eight plays, making it look easy. Brad Johnson completed his first eight passes, and 10 of his first 12. But the Bills kept scoring. "So we hit them first," Tre Johnson said. "There's more than one punch in the fight." As the Redskins fell farther behind, Johnson had to throw on almost every down, and he missed seven of his first eight passes in the second half – his first real fizzle of the season.

"We weren't throwing on our own terms," said Andy Heck.



There were diversionary moments: There was the usual speculation in the press box as to whose head The Danny was going to lop off and put up on a stake. Mike Nolan is always on the bubble. And then there was Matt Turk making himself a prime candidate through his poor punting. Turk had a three-club wind behind him in the third period, and still had ridiculously small punts. The first went 32 yards with the roll! The next went 29. Turk was hooted. As he stomped to the sideline after the second punt, Turk flung his helmet almost as far as he had kicked the ball. Turk appears to be in the endgame here. The fans have turned on him. More important, so has management.

Nothing was as disappointing, though, as the defense. The front four couldn't stop anybody in blue. Buffalo ran for 204 yards – mostly straight ahead. The Redskins thought they had solved this problem when they spent $57 million on Dana Stubblefield and Big Daddy Wilkinson to fill the middle of the defensive line. But are these false hopes?

We've had glimpses of a payoff; everybody was exhilarated by Big Daddy's 88-yard touchdown run against Chicago last week. But more often than not the combination of Stubblefield and Big Daddy has that same fateful echo of the combination of the Wizards' Chris Webber and Juwan Howard – who promised so much and delivered so little.

On Sunday, Stubblefield acknowledged that the analogy to Webber and Howard was reasonable. And he acknowledged there were targets on their backs: "That's part of the business. I knew that. The coaches knew that. But me and Big Daddy, we're going to get it done. Everybody here knows it." Stubblefield smiled gently and said, "We're still around. Nobody has snuck in and taken our names off our lockers yet."

"The owner could do that to anybody," I offered.

A sort of homecoming

Prodigal outfielder sees Greener grass after trade

By Ross Newhan
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES – Shawn Green is returning home, which is big anyway you measure it. Big trade. Big contract. Big pressure and expectations.

It is a challenge the former Tustin High outfielder and Newport Beach resident wanted and welcomed.

Will he handle it better than Eric Davis and Darryl Strawberry, who both learned how tough it is to go home again?

The Dodgers are banking six years and $84 million on it, convinced that Green will be the left-handed run producer they have long needed and mistakenly thought they acquired in the deal for Todd Hundley. They are convinced that Green brings the "character and integrity," as General Manager Kevin Malone put it, that Raul Mondesi... well, Malone didn't say that Mondesi lacked it, but as Dodger Chairman Robert Daly said, "acquiring a player who wanted to be here for a player who didn't was critical."

Rebuilding in the aftermath of a disappointing summer, the Dodgers sent Mondesi to the Toronto Blue Jays on Monday after reaching the contract agreement with Green.

A sad day, said Dave Stewart, the Blue Jays' assistant general manager, in that "you cultivate a young player only to lose him" through baseball's ugly and unforgiving economics. Maybe, said Stewart, a club will have to declare bankruptcy before meaningful changes are made. But as a former big game pitcher familiar with pressure and expectation he also said there are no maybes about Green's ability to cope with the challenge that now confronts him.

"He is a premier player, a five-tool talent," Stewart said. "His statistics tell you what kind of player he is, but there are not a lot of kids walking the earth who are a better person than he is."

A model citizen who needed only a few hours to remind Daly of his younger son, "who I love dearly. I was unbelievably impressed."

So much so that the former Warner Bros. chairman, in an auspicious debut to his new role and still cognizant of star power, agreed to a contract averaging $14 million per year, second only to new teammate Kevin Brown's $15 million.

Green will actually receive $16 million in the fifth and sixth years of the deal, which is a record, but only until Ken Griffey Jr. and Alex Rodriguez sign their next contracts. There is no equating soaring salaries with statistical reality, but Gordon Lakey, a longtime Toronto scout now with the Philadelphia Phillies, agreed with Stewart and said, "There are not many complete players, but Shawn has become one. He's made a lot of strides in all areas. He makes any team a better team."

Slated to bat behind Gary Sheffield in the cleanup role, Green has hit 77 homers and driven in 223 runs in the last two years. He hit 42 homers with a .309 average and 123 runs batted in last year when he led the American League in total bases, extra-base hits and doubles.

UMass fencing crosses swords at Smith tourney

Over this past weekend, the Massachusetts fencing team participated in a collegiate meet at Smith College in Northampton. Teams from 16 different colleges and universities throughout New England came to the competition, with more than 150 athletes competing in all.

The Umass team consisted of 20 fencers, representing the school in three different weapons (foil, epee and sabre) in both men's and women's competition. Considering that the fencers starting in most categories were new to the sport, the results were certainly promising for the upcoming season.

The only UMass fencer to capture a medal was Kristy Szretter, the captain of the women's sabre squad. Szretter showed great skill throughout the tournament, having to give in only in the final bout and capturing a gold medal.

The team will now turn its attention to its next competition. UMass travels to Boston this Saturday for a duel with the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

1/2 in Blacksburg, I'll go with Miami in a low-scoring nailbiter.
Last week: 2-3
Overall: 20-19-1

Nebraska can't open its mouth. It's guilty of the same mishap that riddles Kansas State. Undefeated to this point, the Wildcats now must travel to what amounts to its only test, after holding off Colorado 20-13. The former Big Eight used to be owned by the 'Huskers, who suffered its worst season in God knows how long, losing four games last season.

Nebraska has a history of getting hurt by the deep ball, the most obvious example when Louisiana Tech's Tim Rattay lit the Lincoln skies for 590 yards passing, 405 of which went to current Pittsburgh Steeler Troy Edwards. Kansas State has a big play receiver in junior Quincy Morgan. Averaging over 22 yards a catch, Nebraska coach Frank Solich has to make sure Morgan doesn't blow up in K-State's only hope for a BCS bid. Barring a collapse by the current contenders, the Wildcats will be playing for pocket change (in BCS standards) anyway.

The Wildcats need a big win and they've shown no signs of slowing down on the road, knocking off Texas and Oklahoma State away from Manhattan without a problem.

Getting 8 1/2 for some reason, I'll go with the 'Cats on the road.

For the rest of the world, I'll stick with the 'dogs because that's where this kid is headed. Getting a touchdown hosting Oklahoma, gimme Iowa State. In addition, I'll go with the ever-reliable Vanderbilt at home, getting 2 1/2, against Kentucky, and finally, in what I wouldn't dare call a lock (oh no, not at all), I'll take the Terps getting 33 and change at Florida State.

Jaggassar was proof positive that the Minutewomen were on point. She was constantly putting the stop to the Bear's dribbling. No one could get around her one-on-one; it took at least two people to interfere with her game, and even that was a tough job for the other team. Jaggassar was literally everywhere on the field, but spent most of her time helping out near the circle.

"As a defensive back, you have to work off of your forward movement," Jaggassar said. "Once they're in the right place, and you can see the spaces that you need to cover, it makes it easier to just get there."

California tried to hold on to its original grip on the game, but was helpless against the UM offensive when it finally found its rhythm. While the first half saw a few breakaways and a lot of dribbling, the second half saw all the players congregated around Cal goalkeeper Sarah Hoehn. Kristen Schmidt, Lindsay Abbott and Tamra Geryk kept the adrenaline pumping and the hustle up.

"We're all looking up, and playing a lot more as a team than we have all season," Bohonowicz said.

As the season has progressed, the Minutewomen have become more unified, and have begun to play off of each other in an efficient way. Players are trusting each other's strengths and using their unity as a wall against any opposing team. Their camaraderie was outstanding in this game and was truly the reason for their victory. They just keep showing up to play and playing their own game, supporting each other and making goals happen.

"It's a game to get into the NCAA Tournament, so you're not going to let anything keep you back," Jaggassar said.

troops needed to regroup, and they knew it.

"Berkeley is very, very disciplined in the way that they pattern the ball out," Shea said. "We were not taking the correct angles to pressure the ball. We kind of looked like chickens, running around with our heads cut off."

While the UM defense was laying eggs, the offense seemed equally out of synch over the game's early goings. Senior Chrissy Millbauer keyed a thrilling breakaway down the near sideline at the 12:06 mark, but couldn't get the ball around Cal's Lieke Zoete to set up Schmidt on the wing.

The halftime whistle resounded over a contest still locked at nil-nil, and it was clear that the home team needed some adjustments to crack the Bears' unconventional style.

"It was a different system that they played, and we weren't accustomed to it," said UM back Kerry Ann Jaggassar. "In the second half, we just came out and said 'this is our game; this is what we have to do.' And we just stepped it up."

It didn't take Shea's squad long to right the ship, as Schmidt and Millbauer both challenged Cal keeper Sarah Hoehn with blistering shots less than eight minutes into the second half. Hoehn flashed some artful glovework but couldn't keep it up, as UM midfielder Sarah Bohonowicz set up Abbott with a sharp pass off to the left of the Cal goal that enabled the Northampton native to drive home the game's first score.

"Scoring that first goal gave everyone a little adrenaline," Abbott said. "After that, we just went at the ball even harder and had more confidence with the ball."

That confidence translated into some breathtaking plays by Shea's biggest superstars. Tucker came screaming out of the UM goal to kick away a weak shot by Bear Annika Kuefer at the 16:07 mark, which led to Cal's fifth penalty corner. The Bears ran a nifty delay play to forward Kelli Mirassou on the ensuing corner, but Jaggassar showed brilliant anticipation and snatched the ball right out from under Mirassou's swiftly descending stick. That led to yet another UM rush, highlighted by senior Nicole Bardell dribbling between Sainsbury's feet to beat the Cal senior down the near sideline.

The flash and flair reaped rewards again with 8:20 left, as an aggressive slash toward goal by Jaggassar left her a perfect window through which to feed the lurking Bohonowicz. The freshman's wrist shot just beat Hoehn, and the Minutewomen could smell a win cooking up.

"I saw Kerry Ann driving the endline, and we always have the dogleg back," Bohonowicz said. "I knew I had to hold the top of the circle, but then I saw it coming. I just relaxed, and hit it into the goal."

Junior Tamra Geryk would cap the scoring with 4:25 remaining, taking a feed from Patty Robinson and lifting the ball into the top right corner of the Cal net. With a 3-0 lead, the Minutewomen were able to ride the clearing ability of Bruemmer over the last four minutes and seal up the win. The team will now focus on the NCAA Tournament, the bracket of which has yet to be finalized.

"It's a one game season, so you have to keep moving forward," Jaggassar said. "That's the attitude of our team, we don't want to stop playing now."

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Someone close to you may accuse you of taking advantage of someone else in need. Today, you can prove that your motives are honorable.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) What begins as a friendly contest today is likely to become something from which you can learn many lifelessons, whether you win or lose.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You don't want to admit something to yourself that has been on your mind for some time, but today is the best possible time to face the truth.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You may be facing something that will grow into a major personal challenge in the near future. It's time to focus on specific skills.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You may want to be a little more unpredictable today! Keeping other people on their toes can work wonders when you are in the mood for a little fun.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You should be able to gather the facts and figures you need to put an end to financial or personal confusion by day's end.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You're flirting with danger today, whether you know it or not. If you receive a warning from a friend or loved one, you're best to heed it!

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You're going to enjoy seeing things from someone else's perspective today. Look and learn, and remember that there's always "another way."

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Your physical well-being depends on a large part on your mental and emotional states today. Make sure you're maintaining balance in all things.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Communication may prove to be difficult between you and a friend today. Though you are used to thinking along the same lines, things are changing slightly.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Concentrate on getting things right the first time today, as you're likely to have little time to repeat your efforts, later on.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – It's important that you don't make the mistake today of looking at a rational, professional situation from an emotional, personal viewpoint.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

VTech hoping to renew BCS hype by KO'ing 'Canes

You're not supposed to chop off your head when a headache comes around, but the Miami Hurricanes might encounter a migraine so vicious this weekend that they may have no choice.

Steering the 5-3 'Canes is sophomore quarterback Kenny Kelly, the foundation of their success and their woes. He's not a senior, but Miami coach Butch Davis selected the Tampa native to start over junior Zachary Hart in hopes of rebuilding an offense that relied heavily on running back Edgerrin James and quarterback Scott Covington.

Kelly got the nod and Davis looked like a genius when Kelly threw for a touchdown and ran for another in Miami's 23-12 triumph in the Kickoff Classic against Ohio

State. A month later, Kelly was walking on thin ice when he threw five interceptions against just two touchdowns in consecutive losses to Penn State and East Carolina.

A mid-season resurgence has the 'Canes talking upset this weekend when they travel to Blacksburg to take on a Virginia Tech squad whose ego took a right hook after a near-flop might cost it a shot at the Sugar Bowl.

At the very least, the Hokies survived, keeping its championship hopes alive by failing to enter the loss column. The Mountaineers might stand out, having built a solid football program in the Don Nehlen regime, but there's no hiding their 3-6 record. Best exemplifying the ACC's reign over the former champion of the East, Maryland dismembered the Mounties 53-0 in College Park, sending WVU on a season-long three-game losing streak.

The bottom line is, Virginia Tech can do better than 22-20 in Morgantown. Heading in, very few expected West Virginia to pose a challenge to the Hokies, or rather, for the Hokies to play at the Mountaineers' level. To that point, VTech had steamrolled through the Big East. Sure, the schedule was rather tame, but a 31-7 victory at Virginia and a solid conference showing should be enough if Tech runs the table with comfort, needing wins against the 'Canes and in the season finale against Top 25 newcomer Boston College.

One would think only a career day from WVU's Marc Bulger could keep the Mountaineers even close. After throwing for 346 yards (and four picks... ouch) at the Orange Bowl, Bulger seemed revved to throw his way to victory against the Hokies until encountering an unrelenting pass rush that sidelined the senior for the second half with a bruised right thumb. He threw for just 94 yards and the Mountaineers were forced to use sophomore Brad Lewis, who sparked the offense, marching WVU back from 16 points down to take a late 20-19 lead. Back to Kelly.

In three losses, Kelly has as many interceptions (six) as he does in Miami's five victories. On the opposite sideline stands Michael Vick, who leads the Big East in passing efficiency, has thrown just three picks in eight games.

Look for Tech to immediately take away the running game, forcing Kelly to throw early. Head coach Frank Beamer has to be confident in his secondary's ability to stop Kelly, but the sophomore has shown a knack for the deep ball, hitting NFL lock Santana Moss 32 times for nearly 20 yards per connection.

Miami is second in the nation in turnover margin, forcing 27 turnovers, including 14 fumbles. Shyrone Stith, the Big East's leading rusher with 869 yards and 10 touchdowns, was handed the reins with Tech leading the Mountaineers 19-13. After two carries, West Virginia jarred the ball loose and the turnover set up the go-ahead touchdown, a 16-yard touchdown reception by Khori Ivy from Lewis. This time, in the Big East's Game of the Year, Stith must play the role of the workhorse like he did in the Hokies' 31-11 dissembling of Clemson. His two best performances this season were in the big games, a three-touchdown performance in Charlottesville and 140-yard, two-score afternoon against Syracuse.

While still not a believer in Mr. Kelly, this time he and the 'Canes put it all on the line. In the end Kelly will make one too many mistakes. Miami, like Syracuse, has great talent in the orchestra, but no conductor. Nonetheless, getting 9

UM turns play-in into laugh-in

Minutewomen lock up NCAA berth

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

The day began with two teams knocking at destiny's door. It ended with one determined squad having blown the whole house down.

The Massachusetts field hockey team (14-8, 5-0 Atlantic 10) captured its 10th straight win and a trip to this year's NCAA Tournament by thumping California, 3-0, in yesterday's play-in game at Richard F. Garber Field. The Minutewomen overcame a brutal opening frame and a half-dozen Golden Bear penalty corners to secure the victory and extend their astonishing '99 campaign.

UC-Berkeley (12-5, 5-0 NorPac) unveiled an aggressive, ball-control oriented attack from the opening moments of the afternoon contest. The Bears established early that they weren't afraid to move the ball backward and use the entire width of the field, which caused UM's forwards to endlessly pursue Cal's crisp passes along the field's perimeter.

Massachusetts	3
California	0

"Cal definitely had a different style of playing," said UM forward Lindsay Abbott. "They kept the ball to the outside and opened up the middle a lot, so we had to adjust to the way that they played. It took us a while to figure out how to react to that."

The Minutewomen were clearly frustrated by the Bears' dominating ball movement, and may have let their emotions get the best of them in the first five minutes of the game. Co-captain Lucy Koch lunged wildly at Cal's Megan Sainsbury as the Bear forward attempted to gather in a pass atop the UM circle, and after a brief struggle Koch sent the Golden State native crashing to the turf.

Koch's takedown gave Cal its first penalty corner at the 22:48 mark, during which UMass keeper Zowie Tucker came up with a fantastic lunging leg save. UM sweeper Anke Bruenmer then unloaded a rocket of an outlet pass up the far sideline, which streaking UM forward Kristen Schmidt simply couldn't catch up to. Coach Patty Shea's

Teamwork a key for field's finest

The Bears weren't so Golden as the Massachusetts Minutewomen showed the University of California, Berkeley, whose coast it was on in yesterday's women's field hockey NCAA play-in game at Garber Field. UM earned a trip to this year's tourney with a more than convincing 3-0 win.

The first half of the game was characterized by the frustration of the UMass players. They struggled to keep play in Cal's end, as the Golden Bears played keep-away with the ball. By constantly passing back and forth, California was able to keep the field open and utilize outstanding ball movement.

The UMass forwards were in rotation the entire first half, due to the inefficient running lines. The opposition was definitely making UM work hard to keep up, which tired the Maroon and White's front line.

At the end of the first half, the players looked as if they had lost their edge, but by the start of the second period, it was obvious that the half-time coaching had made some serious adjustments.

"The first half, we really played their game," Midfielder Sarah Bohonowicz said. "The second half, we played our game. The forwards kept up the momentum, chasing the ball from the left and the right. That helps our whole team fall in line, from the midfield on down. That was the difference: we controlled the tempo and played our game."

The second 35 minutes were characterized by serious hustle in the upfield, with the offense finally running up to speed. The attitude change was reflected in the confidence of the team, and consequently enabled the Maroon and White to congregate around the opposing circle.

"I was ready; we were all ready," Defensive back Kerry Ann Jaggassar said. "We've been working hard, so it was just fresh meat."

The shots were abundant, as the Minutewomen learned to give California a dose of its own medicine and took advantage of their own passing skills. From the first minute of second-half play, UM controlled the ball and kept it from falling in front of the wrong stick.

A brand new ballgame: men's hoop buckles down for Round 2

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

It's like one of those talk shows. You know, where people drag their parents onto national television and have them completely done over.

It's like Massachusetts basketball coach Bruiser Flint took his chalkboard, erased all but the roster and then completely redesigned the grand scheme until everything made sense.

Which it did. With a smaller lineup taking the court, Flint was forced to switch to a transition-style offense. While the defense suffered in the Minutemen's 103-97 victory over the California All-Stars last week, Flint will try to iron out the wrinkles when the Converse All-Stars come to town for the second of two exhibition matchups before opening the season with Iona.

"We just have to press a little differently than we did," Flint said. "We tried to press the whole 40 minutes. The point is we didn't have enough guys to do that, and we just got tired."

The Minutemen will come in a little short-handed once again, as Mike Babul and Monty Mack will sit out their second consecutive game, Mack nursing a stress fracture in his left foot.

"We've been putting [Monty] in a different drill every day to see how it is. Every day we try to do a little bit more than the day before," Flint said. "I feel better about Monty than I do about Babul." Flint later added that Babul's back problems have him listed as day-to-day.

Making the best of the arrival of the up-tempo offense was senior Chris Kirkland, who scored a team-high 26 points on 12 for 15 shooting. In addition, the backcourt tandem of Jonathan Depina and Shannon Crooks combined for 37 points and 13 assists. The 103 points mark the highest point total since Amherst cut the tape to open the Mullins Center in 1993.

"You can't press everybody," Flint said. "We're going to try to run on every opportunity. We're going to push the ball, make or miss. That's without question."

Iona grad Kashif Hameed and Marty Clark make up the All-Stars, among others. Hameed who scored 27 points in the Gaels' 66-64 win over the Minutemen last season, while Clark comes to Amherst with a pair of championship rings from his days at Duke.

In addition, an old friend returns home as Charlton Clarke, who averaged nine points per game last season, returns from a stint in Russia to bear the opponent's uniform.

Depina took over for Clarke, collecting 13 points and six assists in a team-high 34 minutes while leading the Minutemen's fast-paced attack. Last season, the Boston native averaged under two points per contest, but has rediscovered the confidence that helped carry he and Mack to two consecutive state championships at South Boston.

"I can't have confidence in him if he doesn't have confidence in himself. That's one of the reasons why he didn't play last year," Flint said. "He came in with a different attitude this year. I think our style of play will help him adjust because you're playing a quicker, faster game."

If you listen, you can hear ever so faintly the sound of alternating piano keys resounding over and over again, signifying the fear that will run through the unfortunate souls who enter the pool tomorrow to compete against a Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team prepared to not just take a bite out of their opponents but swallow them whole.

Attempting to avoid the jaws of the Minutewomen this coming Veteran's Day will be Northeastern University. The Huskies are just coming off a victory against Beantown rival Boston University, whom they defeated 157-143. The win was their first of this season and their first in the American East conference.

Leading the pack for the Huskies was senior Mia Seul, who placed first in two events and helped Northeastern's medley relay team place second. Seul took the 100-yard freestyle with a time of 53.04 and the 50-yard freestyle at 24.28. A dominant force for NU in both events, Seul currently holds the Husky record for both races as well.

Above the water, sophomore Kate Mailman delivered the goods for the Huskies as she walked away with the three-meter dive and grabbed second in the one meter.

However, UM will give up the pursuit of an easy win as they plan to tear in to the Huskies. Already downing their first two opponents, the Minutewomen have destroyed Central Connecticut University and the University of New Hampshire with feeding frenzy viciousness. UMass has not experienced any difficulty picking up wins on the road, and are prepared to be even more devastating in the familiar waters of home.

Junior tri-captain Shannon Rowell set a personal best against UNH in the 200-yard backstroke, with a time of 2:08.97. Her time was good enough to get her in the record books as well, with the fifth-best time in that event in UMass history. Rowell has tied her career best in the 100-yard backstroke as well.

Going stroke for stroke, senior Elizabeth Risotto has been victorious in the 100-yard and 200-yard backstroke. Risotto won both events against Central Connecticut, also setting a pool record during the 200-yard event.

Looking up out of the water, junior diver Robin Velona secured both the one-meter and three-meter diving events against UNH, earning personal bests in each competition. She also cemented her spot in UMass history, placing fifth-best in the one meter and ninth-best in the three meter. Velona won the three-meter when matched up with Central Connecticut as well.

The Minutewomen will get a chance to improve their record to 3-0 by sharpening their teeth on the Huskies at home in the Joseph R. Rogers Jr. pool tomorrow at 1:00 p.m.

Police release sketch of suspect

University of Massachusetts police have released a composite sketch of a man wanted for questioning in relation to a reported rape that occurred on campus earlier this week.

On Tuesday, at approximately 2 p.m., a student reported that she had been assaulted near the Student Union. The victim told police that a man grabbed her from behind and pulled her into nearby bushes as she was walking on the sidewalk south of Metawampe Lawn. According to the victim, the suspect fled the area after assaulting her. The assault is currently being investigated as a rape.

According to police, the suspect in his early twenties, Caucasian, between 6' and 6'3" with short blond hair and a muscular build. He may also have light facial hair in the area of his chin.

A rape occurring under similar circumstances was reported to police a week earlier. On Nov. 2, a student reported that she had been raped near the Campus Center Pond. The victim was grabbed from behind and forced to the ground by a man wearing a ski mask with holes for the eyes and mouth. The suspect fled toward North Pleasant Street after the assault.

Anyone having information on the identity of the man or either of the cases should contact UMass police detectives at 545-0893 or 545-2121. Anonymous tips may be left at 577-8477 (TIPS).

SGA responds to assaults

Plans for rally, reward, speak-out and vigil aired

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

The leadership of the Student Government Association (SGA) announced during a regular meeting of the Student Senate Wednesday night that the SGA is offering a $500 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the individual or individuals responsible for the sexual assaults committed on Nov. 2 and Nov. 9.

The incidents have once again brought to Senate a discussion on its dissatisfaction with the actions of the administration. It was only in recent weeks that Senate members have expressed their concern for not being promptly notified of a meningitis case.

"It is my opinion that the administration has failed in its role of serving the students' best interests," SGA President Jeff Howe, who could not attend the meeting, said in a report. "I feel that they needed to inform every student of the attack so that they had the ability to stay aware of those around them at all times."

Speaker of the Senate Mikale Billard said he was disgusted with the entire incident and especially with the lack of information the students on campus have been given.

"It's just sad. To have the administration tell you they don't need to inform you, that's unsafe," Billard said. "They don't want to tell you because they don't want a panic." He urged the entire Senate to speak to everyone they knew about the incident and to get the word out. "Let people know we won't tolerate this."

To further inform the community, the SGA, Everywoman's Center and Men's Resource Center are co-sponsoring a combined rally, speak out and vigil entitled "Take back the pond – Safety for all." It will be held on Tuesday, Nov. 16 between 12:30 and 2:30 p.m. at the northeast corner of the pond lawn.

In other business of the SGA, motions were discussed and passed involving various aspects of student life in the dorms.

The first was a motion to extend the rights of students. It stated that students charged with a violation could only be relocated and/or restricted from their dorm building after the completion of their judicial case. If it was otherwise determined by the Resident Director (RD) and the Dean of Students office that the student is a threat to the health and well being of the other residents in the community, this rule would not apply.

Currently, RD's are able to remove a student from his or her building before an appeal. Speaking on minor violations, such a removal could have serious repercussions for that student and his or her fellow neighbors, said Seth Avakian, student trustee.

In light of a housing meeting being held next week on the issue, Senate passed a motion on Wednesday affirming its opinion that sophomores, juniors and seniors should be notified in advance of move-in day of their roommate assignment. It was said that communicating with a roommate before one arrives on campus prevents many hassles.

The last motion of the evening involved the responses received from a referendum question regarding additional cable stations. The Senate passed that a $10 housing fee increase for each student, per semester, would be allocated to the Housing Cable Services Network Programming for an increase in cable channels. Although HBO is not on the list of possibilities for added stations because of its cost, some new channels would include ESPN and MTV. When this issue of receiving better television options in the dorms was voted on, over 80% of voting students agreed that they would pay a small increase for such a service. If this issue is further supported and accepted by the administration, the change would go into effect in the fall of 2000.

New parking proposed

By Andrea M. Peers
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Parking Commission held a meeting this past Tuesday to discuss concerns with downtown parking. The new parking permit system was at the top of the agenda for the meeting. Even though this project has been in the works for a few months, the meeting generated feedback on the recent success of the permits.

Parking permits are a new idea that the Parking Commission designed in order to open up parking spaces for people who are residents in the designated downtown area, and for workers. These new permits cost $25 and would designate certain spaces to permit-only vehicles from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., creating a solution to the ongoing need for extra parking. Margaret Roberts, the vice-chair of parking commissions explained the problem.

"People were having a hard time finding parking because there were no allotted spaces for these residents," Roberts said. "This has opened up a lot of space for them so they do not have to fight for parking."

A push for the permits came when the University of Massachusetts decided to increase its parking fees. According to Roberts, this forced students to park in private lots or spaces needed for residents, and the town became very crammed.

"It was very easy for University students to park in town and grab a bus to go to campus," Roberts said.

For students, parking in town may seem cheaper and easier since students could take the free bus service to campus, but did not offer any solution to those in need of the local parking. After the meeting, Roberts said she "came away with the report on the permit system as a positive one." Other members at the meeting include Town Finance Director Nancy Maglione, and Parking Supervisor Iris Galarza.

Other changes regarding the lots involve meters. Downtown meters have now been changed to two-hour meters, versus the old one-hour meter. Private lots as well as permit zones are being monitored now as tow zones for people without the proper sticker or identification. The general consensus of the Parking Commission was that these lots were being used frequently as an alternative to metered lots. The town manager is also notifying all private parking lot owners that they make take police action to move vehicles that are parked without permission.

Aside from the addition of permits and changes to meters, the commission made new loading and unloading zones throughout the downtown area. New signs will be posted, allowing for commercial and residential activity to take place. Included in the new zones is the Lord Jeffery Amherst Inn, who will receive two such zones for guests to unload luggage, and for deliveries. Other areas include two load/unload zones in front of the Webster House on the west end of Lessey Street. Each zone will allow for a 20-minute window.

The Select Board Meeting on the Nov. 22 will address any final concerns and review the new decisions.

Legal services helps student pocket $5,000 in case

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

After a year-and-a-half battle, the Student Legal Services Office, located at the University of Massachusetts, won a case that awarded over $5,000 to its client.

The client, a student at UMass, sued the company Brake King Automotive, Inc. in small claim session of court for breach of warranty, and negligence. The student received out-of-court legal advice from the Student Legal Services Office and represented himself at his hearing. The court found for him, and he was awarded double damages under the 93A claim.

According to Attorney Charles DiMare, director of the Student Legal Services Office, 93A is basically a consumer protection statute. He explained that the 93A clause encourages settling cases earlier rather than later, and also allows awarding of double damages.

The defendant, Brake King Automotive, appealed and requested a trial by jury to evaluate the case. Student Legal Services senior staff attorney Michele Leaf began as representation for the student. Leaf prepared the case with the client and his expert witness, and also met with DiMare in order to discuss strategy for the case. Leaf also filed a total of 45

Clinton marks Veterans Day by reflecting on peace

By Jonathan Weisman
Baltimore Sun

ARLINGTON, Va. – On the verge of a major foreign trip that will take him to Kosovo, President Clinton used a Veterans Day address yesterday to urge Americans to remain engaged globally as "the world's leading force for peace and freedom."

Under threatening skies, Clinton laid a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns, as cannons fired and flags snapped in a cold wind. He then hailed what he called "a bipartisan center" emerging in Washington to aid struggling democracies, secure Russian nuclear weapons and promote peace from the Middle East to the Balkans to Africa.

"Fulfilling our responsibility to lead for peace and freedom, and to be faithful not only to our service personnel but our veterans requires us to do more than prepare people to fight wars and take care of them when they come home," Clinton told an audience of uniformed soldiers and veterans packed into the stately marble amphitheater at Arlington National Cemetery.

Women still face barriers to top jobs

By Nancy Rivera Brooks
Los Angeles Times

Women are making slow but steady progress into the executive suites of corporate America, both in the number of top jobs held by women at the largest corporations and in the ranks of top earners at those companies, according to an analysis released yesterday.

But women are having trouble breaking through the "glass wall" into the sort of jobs that lead to the highest-ranking positions. And minority women in major corporations are rarer still, said a report by Catalyst, a New York-based women's advocacy and research group.

A total of 1,386 women were corporate officers at the nation's 500 largest corporations as of March 31, representing 11.9 percent of officers at those companies. That's a 37 percent increase from 1995, when Catalyst began its census.

Women who are top earners in their companies more than doubled since 1995, jumping to 77, or 3.3 percent of all top earners, from 29, or 1.2 percent.

"Consistently the numbers have gone up year after year, and that's encouraging," said Catalyst President Sheila Wellington.

But the report uncovered a clear shortage of women in line officer jobs, which are positions with profit-and-loss or direct client responsibilities that often lead to the highest jobs in the corporation. Men held 93.2 percent of those jobs, Catalyst found.

"It's clear that there are barriers that have to be analyzed and eliminated," Wellington said. "This keeps women from getting the experience they need to move up the corporate ladder."

Only 1.3 percent of corporate officers were minority women, the study found. This was the first year Catalyst gathered this data.

pages of documents with the court in conjunction to the case. In that same time, the attorney for the defendant was unreachable, did not contact expert witnesses and filed a total of four pages of legal documentation with the court.

On the day before the trial was to begin, Brake King Automotive withdrew its appeal. By doing so, according to DiMare, the defendant refused to negotiate a good faith settlement or prepare for a trial, and forced the opposing council to waste both time and resources. Their behavior also abused the court process. The trial was cancelled too late to find a replacement trial and a half a day of court time was lost. Since the defendant once again violated 93A, by withdrawing from a case because of a fear of losing, they were once again fined double damages and were forced to pay the new attorney's fees. This amount totaled up to $5,341 that was awarded to the UMass student.

DiMare speculated that the cause of the success of the Legal Services Office was due to the experience of the staff working on the case. He explained the between both himself and attorney Leaf there was a total of 45 years of experience working cases of this type.

"We are very experienced in this type of law," DiMare said.

The Student Legal Services Office has been in operation for 25 years, and provides UMass students with the opportunity for help with legal matters. The office provides legal counsel in the areas of housing, consumer law, civil rights, family law, criminal law and traffic citations, personal injuries, employment, University matters and lends legal support to Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) and the Student Government Association.

According to DiMare, the organization typically gives legal advice and specializes less in litigation. He explained that legal services have representation in about 10% of the cases, which typically deal with consumer protection, landlord-tenant cases and civil rights.

nination to prevent wars."

His advisers say the president sees reason for optimism, both for America's service members and veterans and for his foreign policy initiatives. He has suffered some major foreign policy embarrassments this year, first in the congressional Republicans' reluctance to back him in the bombing campaign in Kosovo, then in the Senate's stinging rejection of a long-sought treaty to ban nuclear weapons testing.

But White House aides say they sense a change of heart on Capitol Hill in favor of a more activist foreign policy.

Congress approved a $280 billion defense spending plan that begins the first real increases in military spending in a decade. It includes a 4.8 percent pay raise, the largest since 1982. The $44.3 billion veterans' affairs budget for 2000 is $1.7 billion larger than the 1999 budget, and includes $19 billion for veterans' medical care.

Members of Congress have yielded to most of his diplomatic budget requests. After initially balking, Republicans have agreed to $2.6 billion in additional foreign aid, including $1.8 billion to help implement the Wye River peace accord between Israel and the Palestinians, millions more to help Russia secure its nuclear weapons and at least $210 million to relieve the debts of impoverished nations.

Clinton will leave Sunday on a nine-day European tour that will take him to Turkey, Greece, Italy and Bulgaria. The White House will officially announce Friday that Clinton will add a visit to Kosovo, the site of his most recent foreign policy venture.

Some 50,000 NATO troops – 7,619 from the United States – now guard the fragile peace in the ravaged province of Yugoslavia that has become a de facto U.N. protectorate. The excursion to Kosovo will bring a U.S. president vilified by the Yugoslav government of Slobodan Milosevic onto what is technically Yugoslav soil.

"I'm going to thank our troops and see how they are doing, to support the United Nations operations there, and to see how we are doing in helping the peace to take hold," Clinton said yesterday.

The atmosphere at Arlington during Clinton's speech was strikingly placid, considering the rocky relationship that Clinton once had with veterans. Gone were the protesters who once questioned the leadership of their commander-in-chief.

Instead, service members listened respectfully as Clinton observed Veterans Day.

"When the 20th century began, the headstones that stand in silent formation on these beautiful hills covered fewer than 200 acres," Clinton noted. "Today, at century's end, they cover more than 600 acres. Hundreds of millions of people in the United States and around the world sleep in peace because more than a million Americans rest in peace."

"Go back to Africa!" is an anti-black insult often used by racist whites. White supremacist groups have for years been insisting that America would be better off without blacks, and have urged them to leave the country. Yet for centuries, many blacks have proposed the same plan, albeit for very different reasons.

Dean Robinson, an assistant professor of political science at the University of Massachusetts, explores this paradox in an as-yet-untitled book about the black nationalist movement. He maintains that throughout the long and varied history of black nationalism, there have always been white groups echoing the same ideas.

"Given the conditions that have existed between blacks and whites for the entire period of U.S. history, it's surprising that you'd get arguments by blacks that would mirror those made by people who do not favor racial equality in the U.S.," Robinson said.

In his book, Robinson looks at organizations and activists that have sought separate statehood and territorial sovereignty from the 1800s until the 1920s.

"The reasoning [for black nationalism] basically grew out of pessimism, although that's entirely understandable looking back at the status of black people then," Robinson said. "There wasn't a whole lot of optimism about the possibility of civil rights and equality."

According to Robinson, American blacks looked at various sites for relocation, including Africa, the Caribbean, Central America and, at one point, a colony in Mexico.

"After World War II, black nationalism took on a broader meaning," he said. "Many people who referred to themselves as black nationalists in the 1960s were talking about something like ethnic pluralism. After 1966, black nationalism became virtually synonymous with 'black power.' In terms of politics and economics, it meant black control of key institutions that were controlled or directed by other groups. It signified a sort of new black pride, and racial assertiveness."

"After the end of the civil rights era," Robinson added, "the chief representative of black nationalism has been Louis Farrakhan."

The definition of black nationalism Robinson primarily deals with in his book is the original form – that in which blacks plan to relocate outside of the U.S.

"This is where the paradox comes in," he said. "In each of these historical periods, you could find white organizations and activists advocating similar things. For instance, in the mid-19th Century, there was an organization called the American Colonization Society. It founded Liberia as a place to re-settle free blacks. During the Marcus Garvey movement of the 1920s, estimate placed its membership between 400,000 and 2,000,000.

"Their motives were mixed," he continued. "Some feared that free blacks would inspire slaves to riot, and there were others who saw blacks as tools for bringing Christianity and civilization to what they saw as a barbaric continent. Others just couldn't see blacks and whites living peacefully together."

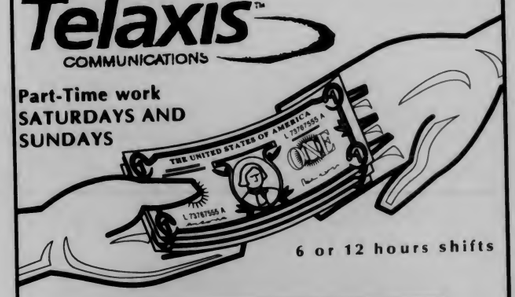
Thomas Jefferson, Robinson argues, espoused this argument. Jefferson claimed that there were fundamental differences between blacks and whites, and that blacks would never be able to forget their victimization. He saw black colonization as the only solution.

Robinsons's explanation for the shared goals of these very different groups is that black nationalism is a reaction to racial inequality. He said white thought and culture and black thought and culture have always been interactive.

"That's not to say that advocates of black nationalism have had anything near the power of advocates of white nationalism," he pointed out.

He went on to say that the same paradox exists today.

"Tom Metzger, the leader of White Aryan Resistance, is anti-capitalist," Robinson said. "In the 1920s, there was an nationalist, socialist group called African Blood Brotherhood. Black Panthers in the late 1960s fought against capitalism, as well.



"What I've found," Robinson said, "is that you can identify groups that inadvertently reproduce the ideas and practices that perpetuate racial inequality, and conform to one of the oldest ideas of white supremacy."

A new monument stone was unveiled at Amherst's American Legion to commemorate yesterday's Veteran's Day holiday. It is identical to one that stands in Washington D.C., though scaled down in size. "Sarg" Steve Learned, a Vietnam veteran who helped raise over $4500 for the stone, presided over the festivities yesterday afternoon, sharing wisdom and smiles. "If those kids can grow up to be seventeen and not go to war, then we are free," Learned said.

Thoughts on privatization

Okay, so maybe I'm a little late with this issue, but it's something that's been annoying me lately. In the past few years, the decision on whether or not we should allow private businesses to take a step on this university has become quite heated. The debate seems like it will never go away because there are simply too many factors to deal with. So it is that I'm about to say isn't new information, but I think it's important.

In case you haven't been able to tell from my previous columns, I'm very big on school support. From the DC's and library, to the unique cheers at the hockey games, everything has tradition. There are probably reasons why things are in place on this campus. Some organizations have been implanted from hard working students that gave everything they have to their position.

Ryan Benharris

For some reason when privatization is discussed here, Starbucks gets pinned as the enemy. Don't get me wrong, I don't agree with privatizing anything here, but alone the campus center, so why do we have to completely trash on Starbucks? The common response would be "because they were the first private company to come here." If you respond this way, do you know how long you are?

First of all, this goes out to the all of the credit card people that I see on campus, but specifically to the ones that were in front of MacImer last week. I leave me alone and get out of my way! I had to step over fifty students to get to class last week, all sitting on the steps to the building that houses my major. That is nothing but an annoyance! There are so many people who fight Starbucks from getting into the campus center, but no one even acknowledges the fact that the credit card people are everywhere. Hello, the lack of common sense meter is off the chart right now. Do you honestly think that Visa is a "mom and pop"-run organization?

There are so many people on this campus that wouldn't think twice about filling out a phony application for a free T-shirt. You see the person trying to throw free gifts at you, and you think, "hey, this guy's my friend." How quickly you people are to forget that this is the same jerk who called you last Saturday morning at 8:00am and woke you up while you were hung over. The only difference is that you're awake and he's got a free bag of M&M's.

Did you realize that even though you're not filling these things out for real, you're selling your name and address to tons of different companies? Don't do this to yourselves, and don't do it to the University. Instead, why not throw a couple of bucks into your U-Card account, or buy a T-shirt from the campus store? Did you ever see that episode of "The Simpsons" where they wanted the huge overgrown advertisements to go away? The way they did this was to stop looking at them. The moral is clear. If we don't pay attention to the people that drive us crazy on campus, maybe they'll stop driving us crazy.

To me, privatization goes much further than just on this campus. I rent all of my movies at Video to Go. I know that the majority of people that are reading this automatically assume that the only place to rent is Blockbuster, but the truth is that Video to Go has been here for a much longer time than Blockbuster has. The videos are cheaper, and they have a much more diverse selection. The problem is that Blockbuster simply walked into the area and pushed Video to Go around. Because of this, the terrific independent video store is in trouble.

I think the group of people at UMass that are the most unaware of the dangers of privatization on campus are the freshman. Most of the freshmen that I've talked to think that it would be cool if McDonald's, Sbarro's and Coca Cola were to take over the Hatch food court. This is not cool. If you haven't eaten at the Hatch, you don't realize how great the advantages of it actually are. Between soup, sandwiches, Mexican food and burgers, the Hatch has something for everyone. The prices are reasonable, and you can use your U-Card. If any random fast food restaurant took over, I'm sure it would be expensive and the food would be crap.

Almost every morning, I get my breakfast at The People's Market. The music is always jumping, the food is awesome and the people that work there are extremely friendly. I'm sure that all of that would go away if Starbucks took over the room the People's Market is in.

Personally, I always get my coffee and such at either the Bluewall, the Coffee Shop or the People's Market. The quality is excellent, and there's a little bit of tradition in every cup. If you haven't supported campus run businesses, I strongly suggest that you do. There is a wide range of things that I haven't even mentioned, and apologize if I don't touch upon, such as the Campus Design and Copy and any of the Registered Student Organizations on campus.

The bottom line is that I don't need a major company to serve me a piece of pizza or a cup of joe. I don't even need money either. The places that I go simply swipe my U-Card.

Wicked accent

When you go to school hundreds of miles from civilization, tucked away in some little hick town in the Berkshires, you're damn proud to be from Boston. Now don't get me wrong, Amherst, I do love you. If you want to get technical, it's more my home now than the one I used to live in.

I spend seven of the twelve months here in beautiful western Massachusetts, and so one would assume that I would have shed my tough city kid mentality and embraced the pine trees and mountains. Two years later, that is certainly not the case, and I yearn for the skyscrapers and crowds now more than ever. It's not like I spend every waking moment asking myself why I didn't just screw Mom and Dad's credit line and go to BU, but I do miss home.

I knew when I first came to this quaint, middle-of-nowhere town that it was no match for me. I'm from Boston. I know the subway lines like the back of my hand, I've been to Fenway too many times to count and I don't even need to look at that painted red line to know that I'm on the Freedom Trail. So what if Amherst has Papa John's? My stomach still cries for Lil' Stevie's on Boylston, where there are crackheads aplenty and the salt and peppershakers are chained to the wall. Frankly, I can handle anything that this city, and all these snotty western Mass. kids can throw at me. I don't care about how you live near Mt. Tom or how you drive to New York City on the weekends.

I'm the tough city kid, and you country folk guys should be intimidated by my fearless attitude while your girls admire my boyish good looks. When you have this attitude, you can imagine the obstacles that I had to overcome upon making friends with the backward kind who actually live out here in the Boonies. Therefore, you can imagine my surprise when I try to talk to a person and they start laughing in my face...

I have what many would consider to be a "thick" Boston accent. No matter how hard I try to concentrate on every little word and its pronunciation, I still come out sounding something like this: "You guys go pahk the cah at the pahty while I run in and grab us a few beahs!!! This place is wicked pissah!" (Translation: "You guys go park the car while I get us a few beers. I really enjoy it here!")

Never, mind you, have I ever felt self-conscious about the way that I speak. Hell, I didn't even know that I had this strange accent until I actually left Boston for the first time. Well, that and the first time that I saw "Good Will Hunting," when two guys who are supposedly from the next town over from me completely brutalized our accent by stressing it so much. "Haaaavahhhid Baaaaahhhhhs." (Translation: "Harvard Bars") Nobody has the accent that bad. How do you like 'dem apples?

I completely lack the ability to pronounce the letter r at the middle or the ending of a word. I can handle it pretty well if the word begins with an r, but other than that, forget about it. It's pretty tough for me, because in addition to being the clear signal that I am from our commonwealth's great capital, it is also the only weak spot that I provide to any hick from western Mass. punk from New Jersey or kid braggin' about how great the beach and the lacrosse is on Long Island. Well let me tell you all a little something, my accent sounds a hell of a lot cooler than yours! I was originally going to try to put that ugly New York accent into words here, but I don't think I could do it justice. After all, considering that we actually get about three really quality cable channels here, we've all seen endless repeats of "Coffee Talk" on SNL, so you know what I'm talking about. At least I'm in my own state on SNL, so you know what I'm talking about. At least I'm in my own state here, buddy!

I really don't know how the whole Boston accent thing started. It's like asking why most people from Texas sound like dopey cowboys, and I'm positive that all Californians don't surf in their spare time. I'm no historian myself, but I've been told that the accent can be credited to the people who first settled the region. Maybe the pilgrims who first landed in Plymouth were actually trying to escape a constant torment over their accents. They saw an end to the constant wisecracking and thought they took a chance, complete with the whole religious persecution thing to fall back on.

Seriously though, think snotty British aristocrat and wiseass Boston teenager – they sound pretty similar, no? Please pass the tea and crumpets (or is it strumpets? Oh hell, I don't know). The fact is, we are just as famous for our accents as they are, and I have people guessing that I'm from Boston for as they like to call it, Bahstin) before I've even fully introduced myself. I swear to God that I am going to whack the next person who asks me to say "Hahvahd Yahd." Is it really that amusing? Am I just some clown who's here to make you laugh? I have a hell of a lot more talents that I would be more than willing to display (including a few that I can't even describe here).

It doesn't upset me that much; after all, I could never be ashamed of where I'm from, but does it make me sound stupid? Do I sound like some moron whose kindergarten teacher was absent the day we got to the letter r in the alphabet? Sure, I try to pronounce a bit more when I'm on job interviews or meeting highly respected people, but... hang on, there's no way that I'm going to start apologizing for my accent. There are worse things that Bostonians could be teased about (and I have). Examples: "Hey Dana, how about some baked beans?," the Patriots (pre-Bill Parcells) and now, thanks to a blind umpire crew, the 1999 ALCS.

See, there are so many other things that people could tease me about, but instead, people pick the one thing that I have absolutely no control over. Well, you know what? I am from Boston, you bet your ass that I have the accent, and there is no way that I'm letting some geek from Worchestah get on my nerves anymore. Besides, I've met quite a few girls who find the Boston accent to be incredible sexy. It's a chick magnet, I swear to God, and I still turn a little red when girls tell me that I sound just like Ben Affleck. Anyway, it feels pretty good to get all this off my chest before we leave for the Thanksgiving break and I go back home.

Ahh, home: where the skyscrapers tower, the traffic jams are long and everyone else talks just like me. Now that's a real city.

In the culture of violence

Last Thursday Kyle Bryant, 19, and Lord Hampton, 20, were arraigned in Roxbury District court for the murder of a fourteen-year-old girl and her fetus. The two men lured Bryant's fourteen-year-old girlfriend to an abandoned lot where she was stabbed repeatedly, beaten with a brick, and buried alive. The Boston Globe carried the story in the top left corner of the front page, with the relatively mundane headline, "2 held in grisly deaths of teen, unborn baby."

Have gruesome killings and unfathomable violence become such a routine part of American life that monstrous crimes are reported in smaller print than a story about the rise in New England oil bills? Yes.

Examine the last several years and you will find a mortifying list of atrocities. The UMass community was stunned last week by the killing of an employee by her husband. Murderous rampages also occurred last week in Seattle and Honolulu. This summer, a stockbroker killed his family and several coworkers in Atlanta and a Los Angeles community center was sprayed with bullets. Three weeks before my high school graduation one of my idols, Phil Hartman, was killed by his wife. School shootings occurred that year in Arkansas, Kentucky, Mississippi, Oregon and Pennsylvania. And last April, I was browsing in a Northhampton music store when I heard the clerk refer to some sort of incident unfolding in Colorado.

Forgive me if this list of tragedies seems morbid. My point is that violence has become an undeniable reality in American life. The tragedy at Columbine high school marked the darkest day of our generation. Those of us in college will inherit its after effects. We will inherit a nation with the highest murder rate in the western world. We will also inherit fear. Since Columbine, the possibility of indiscriminate violence has left me shaken. I have sat studying in the library, wondering if approaching footsteps could possibly bring death. In the 1960's, Jules Feiffer's play Little Murders predicted an America of random mass murder and contaminant paranoia. He proved prophetic.

Richard Anderson

In the months since Columbine, there have been myriads of suggestions and proposals for curbing violence. Most of it is stupid. Legislators have made admirable attempts to pass gun control legislation. Others have suggested harsher criminal sentences. However, law enforcement is only half the problem. America suffers from more than an abundance of deadly weapons. There is a deep sociological/psychological sickness gnawing at certain individuals and producing violence.

This column does not end with a conclusion. Admittedly, I don't know what to do. In the search for answers, however, it is critical to begin by admitting the existence of this sickness. I will define it as a dark force that breeds alienation, hopelessness and profound anger among a growing segment of the population. Under the effects of these multiple diseases, that intangible element called the human soul seems to vanish. In that vacuum of lost humanity, unspeakable acts become possible. Frighteningly, this sickness can afflict anyone. An examination of recent killings shows that violent discontent springs forth regardless of class, race, region, occupation or age.

To deny that this malignance can reside in certain people is unacceptable. During a discussion of the Columbine tragedy on ABC's Politically Incorrect, fatuous host Bill Mahar dismissed suggestions that Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold were neglected by pointing to footage of their elegant homes and luxury cars. What about emotional neglect? Mahar's sentiment reflects the most foolish and dangerous of American values: that material provision equals a proper upbringing. Amidst the computers, stereos and televisions of their comfortable homes, something was horribly wrong. Significant numbers of Americans grow up in secure, stable homes and still become disturbed individuals. What is wrong with these homes?

American life at the end of the 20th century has become a vast wasteland of technological comforts, material values and commercial saturation. In this atmosphere of artificiality, one may easily become lost and confused. Moreover, as our lives have grown increasingly hectic and complicated, many people lack the skills necessary to raise children. Thus, computers and TV's become substitute parents. Kids grow up without any genuine human contact. Nurturing does not occur.

Regardless of socio-economic status, feelings of desolation can emerge in a culture where nothing makes sense and individuals matter very little. In the 1967, Hunter S. Thompson described the violent Hell's Angels gangs as the vanguard of a new era in which a technologically advanced society would be confronted with disaffected and/or underskilled individuals for which it had no use. It is easy to become violent, wrote Thompson, "when you feel like you got a raw deal before you even knew who was dealing."

If abuse, neglect, or chemical imbalances are mixed with anomie, the reaction can be especially deadly. Having worked in childcare, I have witnessed the effects of abuse on young personalities. They are frustrated and angry due to abuse that their minds cannot yet comprehend. Consequently, they react savagely to any perceived injustice because it reminds them of the greater harm they suffered previously. A vicious cycle begins wherein abused individuals erupt into a violent rage with little provocation. Chemical imbalances often produce similar effects.

Martin Scorcese's 1976 film Taxi Driver provides a powerful summary of the cultural, psychological and environmental causes of violence. Tracing the descent the main character, Travis, into a paranoid, isolated, personal hell, the film illustrates how violence comes to be viewed as an acceptable expression of rage. When Travis attempts to explain his loneliness and frustration to a fellow cabbie, he says, swallowing back tears, "I just feel like I've got to do... something." Many disturbed individuals feel they need to do "something," so we ignore them like Travis was ignored in Taxi Driver, there may be deadly consequences.

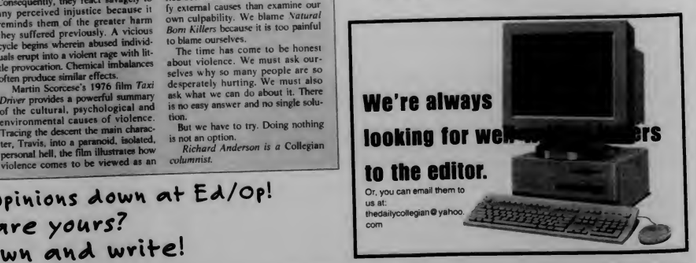
Ironically, Taxi Driver has been condemned as an example of a cultural element responsible for violence. This charge is leveled by those who remember only the gory images and ignore the film's cautionary message. There is obviously gratuitous violence in the movies. However, many of the bloodiest films severely condemn violence. We must be cautious when seeking to gag violent filmmakers. We limit our ability to find solutions when we limit our ability to comment with honesty on violent subjects.



What is ultimately more harmful: the gory content of Natural Born Killers or the celebration of violence in the media that Oliver Stone was attacking? Nearly every sensational event depicted in the film reflects reality. In 1999, Homer Simpson joyfully watching the fictitious Fox program, "World's Deadliest Executions" barely registers as satire. Faces of Death videos, bloody computer games, and exploitive television footage of Ion-Benet Ramsey's beauty pageants: all signal a society entranced by violence.

Oliver Stone is not aware of the "sickness" in our society. He is vilified because we would rather identify external causes than examine our own culpability. We blame Natural Born Killers because it is too painful to blame ourselves.

The time has come to be honest about violence. We must ask ourselves why so many people are so desperately hurting. We must also ask what we can do about it. There is no easy answer and no single solution.

But we have to try. Doing nothing is not an option.

Raised by Lesbians soars

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

At a crucial moment in Leah Ryan's play Raised By Lesbians, sixteen-year-old Joe envisions what will happen at the dreaded moment when his mother finds out the truth about his sexual orientation.

"Oh, where did I go wrong?" she cries. "You were so perfect, such a perfect child. The day you were born was the happiest day of my life. I raised you the best I could, I worked my fingers to the bone, and now...now THIS! I suppose you're going to join the Christian Coalition and bomb some abortion clinics, now, huh?"

"You think all straight people do that, don't you?" he replies.

Joe, you see, is a heterosexual, living with his mother and her girlfriend in Raised By Lesbians, a blisteringly funny and surprisingly moving comedy staged Monday night at Smith College.

"The play deals not only with Joe's struggle to make peace with his family, but also his struggle with his own identity," says director Maggie Wood, a Smith junior. "It's very universal."

Wood assembled a flawless cast to perform Raised By Lesbians, which was received with great enthusiasm by both gay and straight audiences alike. Jason Pizzarello, a UMass freshman, played Joe with a perfect balance of sly humor and teen angst. As Joe, he imagines his mother Alice (played with over-the-top comic brilliance by Kate Hutchinson) and her girlfriend Rita (Jake Lipman, in a hysterical performance) as rogue scientists raising a "Feral Freak Boy" they found in the wilderness. His friend Gracie (played by Erin McCauley) documents his inability to decide between his mother, whose lesbianism embarrasses him, and his father (scene-stealing Hampshire senior Tim Andrews), who suggests that they "drink beer in their underwear all day and go to titty bars every night."

Raised By Lesbians succeeds not only because of the play's undeniable humor, but also the unique nature of its story line. There have been countless plays, movies, and television programs dealing with the struggle of children coming out to the parents, yet the issue of gay parenting is almost entirely ignored.

"It's interesting," says Wood, "because Rita and Alice don't appear to have the best relationship. It doesn't make their relationship seem any different from straight relationships.

"The fact that Joe has problems with it," she adds, "brings to light that there are still problems. Raised By Lesbians isn't about a community beating up two women, though. Their main conflict is [with their son]."

Another strength of the play is the remarkable ability of Ryan, an open lesbian, to identify with heterosexual stereotypes of lesbians. In one scene, Gracie tells Joe that she had a "long talk" with his mother and her girlfriend, and he imagines them indoctrinating her into their "secret club" by doing a ceremonial dance to the music of Melissa Etheridge.

Despite the many moments of humor, Raised By Lesbians is not a puff piece. While the typical play would feature a feel-good ending with Joe tearfully telling his mother he loves her, Raised By Lesbians avoids such banalities. Throughout the play, Joe debates whether to live with his mother or his father, continually telling himself that an advantage of living with his father is "no one would know me." At the end of the play, he again balances the positives and negatives of each choice. He tells "no one would know me" in both categories.

"I don't see the ending as ambiguous," says Wood. "I feel like he does make a decision. Maybe there isn't a decision about where he's going to go. But he does acknowledge that maybe his situation is OK.

"You reach a certain age where you value things that are different about you," she says. "Joe comes to the realization that it's not good to hide who you are."

Author Hardy Speaks

By Meg Hebert
Collegian Correspondent

"One of the best!" said an attendee of James Earl Hardy's November 4th presentation entitled "All Blacks are Heterosexual, and All Gays are White...Or So They Say." Hardy's lecture was a part of the Stonewall Center GLBT lecture series, which takes place every Thursday at 12:30 p.m. in the Campus Center. "I learned a lot, liked the mixture of poetry, expository writing, and personal experience," said Zan Goncalves, an audience member. All were quiet as Mr. Hardy read a poem he wrote for a rally at which he was asked to speak. When he finished, the many people filling the chairs of the Campus Center room clapped spontaneously.

The poem speaks of various people's reactions to a particular (fictitious) man who is gay. The man's mother is in denial, expressing attitudes like, "No son of mine is like that," and hoping "gayness" is just a phase for her child. His father just said, "Don't," and then stopped saying anything at all. Then, the man's wife left with their child when she found her husband being intimate with a man. Honesty and acceptance of this man's true self most probably would not have yielded such a scenario. Unfortunately, however, many "same-gender-loving" people (an expression Mr. Hardy prefers to use in place of "gay") face strained interactions similar to ones articulated in the poem.

Mr. Hardy is black and same-gender-loving; he celebrates both identities as one. He is often asked, "Are you black first, or gay first?" usually by people who are not both black and gay. Black and same-gender-loving are adjectives that help describe the human being James Earl Hardy – without order. It is a shame that our society often puts people in restrictive boxes based on adjectives such as race and gender. Viewing Black, Asian, Latino, Native American, White, masculine or feminine as one fixed set of rules is quite limiting. We need to find a balance of appreciating individual identities, while not stifling people from their full potentials.

"River of Denial", an article Mr. Hardy wrote for The Advocate caused many people to dissect the language they use. For instance, some have said, "I see Colin Powel as an American Hero, not as an African American," as if he cannot be both at the same time. Mr. Hardy points out that we cannot have an honest dialogue with dishonest language. For instance, the claim to be "color blind" with regard to someone's skin color is only true for people who are really blind. Mr. Hardy asks, "You mean to tell me that you can enjoy a blue sky and a burnt orange sunset, but you can't see my brown skin?" The messages – do not deny someone respect or fair treatment based on skin color, but also do not deny his or her skin color and racial heritage. "Reverse" racism is another trouble-some phrase – there is no "forward" or proper direction for racism to go, but specifying "reverse" racism could imply this. Another phrase to think about is, "Black on Black crime." Why is this used, when the phrase "White on White crime" is not?

Another thing Mr. Hardy brought up is that being a member of an oppressed group does not make one free of prejudice. There are same-gender-loving people in the hip-hop world regardless of machismo, and super-thug images. In fact, judging from the amount of gifts and e-mails Mr. Hardy received in thanking him for writing books like B-Boy Blues, the first gay novel grounded in the Afrocentric experience, there are lots of same-gender-loving Blacks. Hardy's books explore the B-boy, or rough-neck culture – an important component of the image and ideology of many gay and bisexual men of African descent. Mr. Hardy understands the motive of Black entertainers to be very deeply in the closet – almost in "the vault" – because of the risk to their career and the danger of coming out. However, he notes that staying hidden because of what "they," meaning homophobes in society, might say or do gives power and control over to "them." Hardy also feels that same-gender-loving people remaining silent may be underestimating the public. He explained that, for example, if you are an artist and your music is good, but you are GLBT and out of the closet, people will still buy your music. Even if you lose some fans due to your honesty, you will still reach those people who really like your music.

Later that day, the Stonewall Center co-sponsored an evening reading of Hardy's work. In addition to reading from his novels, Hardy also signed books for interested people in the audience. In addition to writing B-Boy Blues, Hardy has also written two sequels to the novel, 2nd Time Around and If Only for One Nite, a biography of Spike Lee, a portrait of BoyzIIMen, and many entertainment articles for the media. Hardy is a 1993 graduate of the Columbia University School of Journalism. He has been honored by the American Association of Sunday & Feature Editors and has won the E.Y. Harburg Foundation Arts Award and the Educational Press Association Award.

Professor Unveils Film

By Anna Feder
Collegian Correspondent

Five College visiting professor and filmmaker Crystal Griffith presented her directorial debut to an enthusiastic audience in Stoddard Hall at Smith College during the evening of Sunday, November 7. The screening took place as part of the Northampton film festival's Out and About gay and lesbian film series.

Griffith's movie, "Del Otro Lado" ("The Other Side"), began with a Sioux prayer for the dead before unfolding a story of two lovers, Beto and Alejandro. The story begins with a woman and a man sitting alone in a darkened field discussing their motives for a midnight crossing over the U.S. Mexican border, to the "other side".

The situation is set very early, as we learn that Alejandro is HIV positive and not responding to medication. His only option is to go to the United States, where new drug combinations are being tested. The film deals with the reality of AIDS interacting with everyone's experience in dealing with Alejandro's decision. It doesn't shy away from the details of the living with the disease, from medication side effects and their enormous costs to even the daily task of informing others of your condition.

The harsh narrative is broken with dream sequences in which a friend of Beto's, who we learn had died earlier in the film, visits him. This transvestite angel comes to protect the characters in a sort of fairytale fashion. It becomes the fantasy for the audience as well, connecting all of the characters in a more cosmic sense and negating the notion that death equals loss.

Though in rough cut form, as Griffith explained, the film completed the narrative circle coming back to the beginning scene where the man, Alejandro, is forced to cross the border illegally. The scene becomes even more tense as it cuts between both his father and lover's praying for his safe journey.

In the question-and-answer period, the audience was given a chance to ask the filmmaker about her experiences as a first time director on a low budget film. "I found it really easy to communicate with the crew," she said. Griffith who has worked her way up the ranks, served as a camera assistant for Spike Lee and a director of photography on "A Litany for Survival," a film about Audrey Lorde. "I could focus more on the actors. They all came from a theater background. In Mexico they have a strong tradition of melodrama and I wanted to respect that, but I had to bring down their performances."

It was also a challenge for Griffith to direct a film in Spanish. "It's not my first language," she said "I am fluent in it, though." Overall she felt that the biggest obstacle, like any independent production, was the finances.

The film, which premiered at the San Francisco Gay and Lesbian Film Festival in June, is set to show in Mexico later this month. When asked what she had hoped to accomplish in the making of this film Griffith said, "I hope that the film will open a dialogue on HIV in the third world and Latin America."

Del Otro Lado was shown along with another independent GLBT-related movie, People Like Us, which dealt with the effects of internalized homophobia on a lesbian relationship. Earlier that weekend, on Saturday, the Out and About film festival also showcased four short GLBT-related movies at Stoddard Hall – My Femme Divine, Boy Next Door, love, death, and cars, and Sum Total – as well as a lecture by filmmaker James Schamus at the Northampton Arts Center.

Shepards reach agreement

By Tom Kenworthy
Associated Press

GOLDEN, Colo. - Judy and Dennis Shepard tempered justice with mercy and may have spared the life of the man who killed their son.

In a dramatic and surprising end to the Matthew Shepard murder case, convicted killer Aaron I. McKinney, 22, on Thursday was sentenced to two life sentences for beating the gay University of Wyoming student to death last year. McKinney accepted a deal brokered by Shepard's parents just as a jury was about to begin hearing testimony about whether he should be put to death.

The unexpected agreement was announced Thursday morning in the same Laramie, Wyo., courtroom where the seven-man, five-woman jury found McKinney guilty on Wednesday of felony murder, kidnapping and aggravated robbery. The panel was set to begin the penalty phase of the trial Thursday morning, and McKinney's life hung in the balance.

It was 13 months ago that McKinney and an accomplice posed as homosexuals and lured Shepard from a bar, drove him to the outskirts of Laramie, tied him to a fence, savagely pistol-whipped him and left him to die.

"Mr. McKinney, I give you life in the memory of one who no longer lives," Dennis Shepard told his son's murderer in court Thursday morning. Some jury members wept as he talked about a diminutive, trusting son who could see only good in others, who had nervously told his father he was gay, and who had "paid a terrible price to open the eyes of all of us" to the intolerance faced by the gay community. And most poignantly of all.

Earlier, McKinney had briefly addressed the Shepards, saying he was "truly sorry to the entire Shepard family," the Associated Press reported.

The sentencing agreement bars any appeal by McKinney and guarantees he will remain in prison for the rest of his life. It resulted from a request by McKinney's attorneys, Dion Custis and Jason Tangeman, to meet with the Shepards, whom the lawyers asked to spare McKinney's life, according to Albany County prosecutor Cal Rerucha and people close to the Shepards. Judy Shepard agreed and went to the prosecutor to iron out the deal.

"To my knowledge it was Judy Shepard's decision," said David Smith, a spokesman for the Human Rights Campaign and an adviser to Judy Shepard as she has become a human rights advocate over the past few months. I think it is the most stunning act of benevolence I've ever seen. In essence, Judy Shepard spared his life. It's a testament to her human spirit."

Rerucha, addressing the news media Thursday outside the Albany County Courthouse, made it clear that had it been up to him alone, no consideration would have been shown to McKinney, who planned the attack. McKinney's accomplice, Russell Henderson, pleaded guilty on the eve of his trial last April in exchange for spending the rest of his life in the Wyoming Penitentiary.

A real message was sent ... by the Shepards," Rerucha said. "They lost what was most important to them, but they could look in the eyes of the man who took their son and give him mercy."

In his address to the jury, Dennis Shepard suggested he took some solace in the fact that his son spent his final night in the company of "lifelong friends": the night sky, "the smell of Wyoming sagebrush," the "ever-present Wyoming wind" and God.

"I too believe in the death penalty. I would like nothing better than to see you die, Mr. McKinney. However, this is the time to begin the healing process. To show mercy to someone who refused to show any mercy. Mr. McKinney, I'm going to grant you life, as hard as it is for me to do so, because of Matthew...Every time you celebrate Christmas, a birthday or the Fourth of July, remember that Matthew isn't. Every time that you wake up in that prison cell, remember that you had the opportunity and the ability to stop your actions that night. You robbed me of something very precious, and I will never forgive you for that."

Many Oppose Benefits For Same-Sex Couples

By Mike Causey
Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Uncle Sam's in-house health program - the Federal Employee Health Benefits Program - is the nation's biggest group plan. It covers 9 million current and former federal employees, their spouses, dependent children and, in some cases, ex-spouses. Feds here have 14 plans to choose from.

The government - also known as the taxpayers - picks up an average of 72 percent of the total premium for federal workers and retirees. The U.S. Postal Service pays an even bigger share of the total premium for its clerks, letter carriers and other active duty workers. The federal plans make no distinction between young and old, healthy or terminally ill. All pay the same premiums in the same plans for the same coverage. Plans offer two options: Self-only and family. A family can be husband-and-wife or a married couple with 3 – 6 children.

But while everybody in the program enjoys the benefits of a group plan – to some extent or another – some people don't like the way the group is defined. For example, some gay and lesbian federal workers feel they have the same right to family coverage as traditional married couples. Here's some reaction:

Robert H: "If the government is going to provide 'health' coverage for same-sex couples, what next? Life insurance? Survivor annuities? Two same sex heterosexual friends who share a house? Opposite sex heterosexual friends who share a house? Singles who are foster parents? A priest and his housekeeper? Etc. Etc. The whole idea of beginning with coverage for same sex couples for health insurance is an absurdity..."

Dan Haney: "The...point of family coverage for couples is to provide for the children where one partner is working and the other is caring for the home and children. No children, no coverage, no loss. In same sex situations both parents presumably can work and if one is disabled the other partner can provide the difference between benefits and the previous income. To provide both partners with the opportunity for medical coverage is redundant and at employer expense, simply permitting a much better lifestyle for the vast majority of gay/lesbian couples than child-raising, married couples. The argument that that gay/lesbian workers [subsidize] family plans is flawed since it ignores both the employer contributions and the fastest-growing segment of health care expenses: HIV and AIDS."

C. King: "If a company offers same sex equal benefits coverage how fair it is not to offer the same benefits to a man and woman who live together? What about a father and daughter who live together? If there is no legal marriage how do you determine what other kind of couple should or should not receive benefits?"

Michael Dawson: "...Try relocating with the federal government when you have a same sex partner. My agency puts a premium on being mobile when making promotional selections. However, regulations do not recognize same sex partners so the cost of relocating the same sex partner is paid out of pocket... My partner of 12 years has put his career on hold and had to change jobs twice so that I could take advantage of promotion opportunities... Not only does he have to find a new job and temporary health coverage with each move, he can't even have his name on the deed to your home... Unmarried straight couples simply have to get married prior to (relocating). Obviously same sex couples don't have that option."

Mary Kay: "...the government has never offered health plan coverage for unmarried couples of the opposite sex, so why would they offer it for couples of the same sex?"

rifling through my boxed up childhood on the eve of my parent's move

i find a forgotten Barbie
-my mentor through childhood passed on to me by my mother-
a relic from the sixties

my first instinct is to burn the apron and rescue her from domesticity
a box made to look like a dressing room lots of mirrors reflecting superficially two of the Barbies looked at each other maybe for the first time they begin to do things

I didn't know they could kissing and shedding tennis dress and party guests relaxing tippy toes and dissolving permanent make-up with fevered caresses

They might be in town; Giants to take AC stage

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

It wasn't too long ago (by some people's perceptions) that They Might Be Giants were playing the Iron Horse frequently. These days you're lucky if they come around at all when a new album is released. Strange, since we are so close to their hometown of Brooklyn, NY. It has been well over a year since they last came around (May of 1998 at Pearl Street), and since then they have release two new albums and toured the U.S. and Europe.

At least you can't accuse them of being lazy.

Consistently releasing at least one new album every two years since their eponymous debut album in 1986, They Might Be Giants could be argued as the hardest working band in the business. Their latest releases—last year's live effort Severe Tire Damage, and the Mp3 only Long Tall Weekend, carry with them all the off-beat fun that one would expect from a TMBG album.

The core members — John and John (Linnell and Flansburgh respectively) originally from Lincoln, Mass. began their musical career as They Might Be Giants with a move to New York City and a underground hit (on Dial-a-Song: (718) 387-6962) with "Don't Let's Start," which is a song about, as Linnell put it, "not let's starting." From there the album They Might Be Giants was released independently featuring "Don't Let's Start" and other TMBG classics such as "She Was a Hotel Detective" and "Put Your Hand Inside the Puppet Head." It wasn't soon later that their second album Lincoln (1988) was cut and pressed. Their follow up saw the single "Ana Ng" rise to the top of the "alternative" charts. They were shortly thereafter signed to Elektra Records — which released their immensely popular 1990 album Flood.

It's hard to imagine that a love song sung from the point of view of a canary-shaped nightlight would be taken seriously. But "Birdhouse In Your Soul" became the most recognizable song from Flood, next to their cover of The Four Lads' 1951 song "Istanbul (Not Constantinople)." The 1992 album, Apollo 18, didn't produce anything as popular as Flood did, but songs like "The Guitar," "Mammal," and "The Statue Got Me High," pleased the Giant's fans.

1994 saw some personnel changes in They Might Be Giants. Ever since the band's birth the only official members have been Linnell and Flansburgh. But the release of John Henry, was touted as their first as a full band. Drummer Dan Hickey and bassist Hal Cragin (best known for working with Iggy Pop) were added to the mix.

Unfortunately, John Henry was far from their best work, despite producing the ultra-cool track "Snail Shell." TMBG redeemed themselves two years later with the vastly underrated LP, Factory Showroom. The Curtis Mayfield inspired "S-E-X-Y-," the vintage Giants' track, "'Till My Head Falls Off," and "XTC vs. Adam Ant" are They Might Be Giants at the top of their form.

On their own, Flansburgh achieved success with his side project band,. Mono Puff, whose two albums, Unsupervised, and It's Fun to Steal are nothing short of goofy excellence, and Linnell has a recently released a solo album entitled State Songs.

Long Tall Weekend is definitely a strange collection of songs, aside from their restricted availability in the controversial Mp3 format. "She Thinks She's Edith Head" and "Dark and Metric" are some of the more noteworthy selections from this otherwise fluffy album. Long Tall Weekend comes off as more of an experiment than an actual album.

Severe Tire Damage, if everything was right and good in the world, should have been a double album with a video to go along with it. Try as it did, the live CD failed to capture the true essence of a TMBG show, opting for predictability over spontaneity — all the more reason to catch them at Amherst College tomorrow. A They Might Be Giants show is something that must be experienced firsthand. If you're not planning on attending, well... then I guess a good time will be something that will elude you for the rest of your boring, miserable existence on this godforsaken planet.

They Might Be Giants will be playing at Amherst College Alumni Gym at 8 p.m. Tickets are $15 and are available at For The Record in Amherst, at Room 103 of the SU Campus Center, or through ProTix by calling (860)422-0000.

STONE TEMPLE PILOTS
No. 4
Atlantic

The Stone Temple Pilots had a lot to prove with this album. Their history is plagued with internal band conflict and vocalist Scott Weiland's struggle with heroin addiction, which prompted a separation after the release of their third album in 1996. Weiland released a solo album, and the other three members found themselves another singer and worked on a side project called Talk Show. Neither album was received with much enthusiasm, and the band reconciled their past problems and reassembled to work on the Stone Temple Pilots' fourth album, aptly titled No. 4. The album's 11 tracks run the gamut of the band's signature sound, while managing to explore new territory.

The first two tracks, "Down" and "Heaven & Hot Rods," are classic STP, rocketing forward with the same gritty guitars and pounding rhythm section that made them one of the foremost grunge rock bands of the early nineties, and opening the album the same momentum of Core's "Dead and Bloated" and Purple's "Meatplow." Scott Weiland's vocals, which switch between a soaring falsetto and a wonderfully appropriate monotone drawl, are in top form. You could accuse the band of failing to move forward after all of their years together, but energy and tightness of their sound more than compensates for any repetition of style.

"Sour Girl" is a refreshing break, a

Fountains of Wayne come to AC

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

If ever a band deserved more recognition than they receive, it's Fountains of Wayne, the New York-based retro-pop band that's set to play Amherst College tonight. The quartet has generally sat on the outside of mainstream music, and their numerous singles have received precious little radio attention, despite the near-unanimous praise of music critics and an ever-spreading fan base.

Fountains of Wayne entered the scene with their self-titled 1996 album, and the irresistibly catchy single "Radiation Vibe" earned a respectable amount of radio play. Those willing to give a closer listen were treated to a disc ripe with power-pop that betrayed bandleaders Chris Collingwood and Adam Schlesinger's clear admiration of the British invasion and the art of the 3-minute song. They toured with the likes of The Lemonheads and The Smashing Pumpkins, proving that the world still loves good, old-fashioned rock.

Fountains of Wayne's sophomore album, entitled Utopia Parkway, takes the nascent energy of their first disc and infuses it with more mature pop sensibilities and a consistent lyrical thread of suburban malaise. Songs like "Red Dragon Tattoo," "Prom Theme," and "Troubled Times" display a decidedly adolescent take on romance, prompting some to dub Fountains of Wayne the foremost purveyor of Geek Rock. Don't let it dissuade you, however; Collingwood and Schlesinger have proven themselves masters of guitar hooks, and the songs on Utopia viperHouse grooves into the Horse

By Julie Dana
Collegian Correspondent

With their funked out grooves and jazzy riffs, viperHouse erupts from the well-reputed Burlington, Vermont music scene and returns to Northampton's Iron Horse tonight. Their unique combination of jazz, funk and rock produces a vibrant sound that appeals to the senses, uniting the music with the soul.

Attracting a wide range of listeners, from the silent head-bobber suavely sipping his drink in the corner to the energetic hip shaker who can't prevent themself from grooving out to the beat, viperHouse are sure to infect all in their vicinity with their smooth, rhythmic style.

The nine-piece ensemble combines a myriad of sounds, including violin, Hammond B-3 organ, percussion, guitar and a horn section, along with the seductive vocals of Heloise Williams, whose tantalizing voice darts in and out of each song at precisely the right moment. Their different approach at music is a pleasing deviation from the jam band genre, while keeping the same positive, upbeat scene.

Their most recent CD release, Lap Hen, was recorded live amongst friends at a small cafe in Brattleboro, Vermont. viperHouse, a band known for their live performances released their second live album through Magic Hat Records. Despite being approached by a different record label, viperHouse preferred to do it their way with the help of Magic Hat Brewery allowing them to retain the rights to the record. Magic Hat, most commonly known for their fine ales will now also be known for their willingness to promote the local music scene.

Previous CD release have included viperHouse (1996), Ottawa (1997) which was the first live album recorded at the Ottawa Jazz Festival, and Shed (1997).

Their mind-devouring melodies and infectious rhythms will consume you whole as the beat gets your feet moving surrendering your body and mind to the flow.

ViperHouse will be playing at Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton tonight at 10 p.m. Tickets are available at For the Record in Amherst, at the Northampton Box Office or at the door. Salamander Crossing is also on the lineup, their set will start at 7 p.m.

Fountains of Wayne, all decked out to take the stage at Amherst College tonight.

Fountains are wonderfully textured with Crosby-esque vocal harmonies that pay homage to the Beach Boys, and tasteful-ly psychedelic guitar effects. When Collingwood sings potentially syrupy lyrics such as "maybe one day soon / it'll all come out / how you dream about me affects sometimes," it comes across completely sincere.

At this writing, Fountains of Wayne is touring with pure rock & roll energy, exploring through long sets of their original songs and tossing out generous renditions of cover songs (they may be the only band in existence able to turn "Baby, One More Time" into a legitimately catchy pop song). Their concerts aren't to be missed, especially in the medium-to-small sized venues they frequent.

When Fountains of Wayne isn't showering the world with their joyous pop-rock, they have several side projects with which to occupy themselves. Schlesinger earned himself an Oscar nomination for writing "That Thing You Do!" for the similarly titled Tom Hanks film. He also comprises one third of the mellower pop band Ivy, along with Andy Chase and French singer Dominique Durand; their 1998 album Apartment Life is a wonderful companion to Utopia Parkway, soothing and fluid. Collingwood contributes some guitar to the album, as does Smashing Pumpkins guitarist James Iha. Schlesinger and Iha also teamed up with the D'Arcy (who recently quit her position as the Pumpkins' bassist) to form Scratchie Records.

Fountains of Wayne will be playing at the Amherst College Keefe Campus Center Frontroom tonight at 8 P.M. Tickets are $10, and are general admission.

New album from 311 a hit

311 – Soundsystem
Capricorn Records

Tomorrow night, alternative rockers 311 are invading the Worcester Palladium. The show, that's been sold out for quite some time now, is part of a tour promoting the band's new album Soundsystem.

Soundsystem is the fifth studio album for the highly successful band. Their prior musical contributions are Music, Grassroots, 311, and Transistor. 311 also released a live album in 1998. Soundsystem is the typical 311 sound that audiences have grown to like over the past few years. Coming off a sub-par sales performance of Transistor, 311 has hit a much better target with Soundsystem.

The first single off of the album, "Come Original" has received a lot of airplay in some of the biggest rock stations in the valley.

There is no mistaking that Soundsystem is from 311. The unique sound that they have developed makes them easy to recognize, and the voices of lead singers Nicholas Hexum and S.A. are very difficult to confuse with other people. The past success of 311's self titled album that was released in 1996, that included the two highly successful tracks "Down" and "All Mixed Up," has become the signature of the group's career after its release.

Unfortunately, everything that 311 attempts to do will be compared to that 1996 release. What a lot of people don't know about 311 is that their first album, Grass Roots, was equally as good. Transistor was not very good, and much less remembered than its predecessors. However, 311 has seemingly returned with Soundsystem. Much of the album is like their early releases, and some of the songs are surprisingly heavy. This is unusual for a band that relies so much on the rapping talents of the singers. The non-vocal music on the album plays a crucial role on Soundsystem's quality. On the third song on the album, "Large in the Margin," the vocals stand out, but the guitars are excellent.

The disc highlights the sound that has made the band so popular, and after Transistor, it seems like there's no way that this could be anything but an improvement.

This Saturday, when 311 comes to the Palladium, they will bring their unique sound, as well as a unique touring philosophy. The first question that I asked when I found out that they were playing the Worcester Palladium was "why?" The palladium is about a block down the street from the Worcester Centrum, and the Centrum holds about 10,000 more people, 311 could have easily sold out the Centrum in a quick a fashion as they did the Palladium. The fact is that they're playing shows all over the country in venues that are this small, which also includes a stop at Lupo's Heartbreak Hotel in Providence, RI tonight. The question about why they are doing this still remains though. Perhaps their intentions are not to sell more CDs, and to give the fans what they want, a quality show.

The other weird aspect to their tour is that there are no opening acts on any of their shows. The band wants their fans to come specifically to see them, and that is it. So, when a band takes the stage at 8:00pm, it will be the main attraction, and no imitations.

311 is no stranger to the Umass community. In the past three years, they have done two shows at the Mullins center. The second show was in 1997, which was opened by Sugar Ray. From what I can remember, the show was quite good, with an outstanding drum solo, by drummer Chad Sexton.

The show will assumingly take much of its material from Soundsystem, but it's obvious that the fans will want to hear some of the old stuff that made 311 so famous. I can't imagine seeing 311, and not hearing "Down," even though I've heard it about four million times on the radio.

When 311 takes the stage this Saturday night, it will certainly be a unique experience. There are so many bands such as Lit and Shootyz Groove that have tried to rip off the sounds of this wildly successful band from Nebraska. However, none have been able to been able to profit as much from it. Grade: B spacey, melodic song about unrequited love. Net opens doors to new charities

By Judith H. Bernstein
Newsday

It sounds too good to be true, like eating pounds of chocolate mousse and losing weight at the same time: Give to your favorite charity, but don't bother to reach into your pocket for the extra cash or to whip out your checkbook or credit card. It won't cost you a thing.

Consumer watchdogs' ears perk up at come-ons like that. But in the case of Web shopping sites that promise you can have your stuff and give it away, too, so far nobody seems to have much bad to say. As a matter of fact, consumer watchdogs – including the Better Business Bureau and the National Charities Information Bureau – don't even have any policies or warnings that specifically target online shop-and-give sites. Rather, some are touting these virtual malls as another avenue for non-profits to reach donors.

Audri Lanford, co-editor of Internet Scambusters, a consumer Web site and electronic newsletter that alerts Web surfers to online fraud, seemed taken aback when asked about shop-and-give sites. "We haven't done an investigation into these kinds of sites. Mainly because we haven't heard any complaints about them," she said.

These sites, which seem to be popping up daily as the holiday shopping and giving season approaches, promise that a percentage, typically about 5 percent, of what you spend on purchases made though them goes to the charity of your choice.

The Web sites often include lists of major national charities that they deal with – such as the American Red Cross, Big Brothers-Big Sisters of America and the World Wildlife Fund – and "mall" areas, where they group merchandise that can include books, music, office supplies, health and beauty aids, computer software and hardware, clothing, food and toys. Prices are usually comparable to those on non-charity sites.

Usually for-profit businesses, the sites act as liaisons among vendors, shoppers and nonprofits. Some sell banner ads that will be viewed by the shopping hordes. Others make deals with the charities – in return for bringing people to the nonprofits, the shopping sites are paid a fee or get a cut of what the charity earns. A rare few work strictly as volunteer operations, and send 100 percent of what they make to nonprofits. But all admit that this e-philanthropy space is becoming highly competitive as more shoppers get online and become more comfortable with the whole Internet shopping experience.

What may be spurring the growth of these sites is a trend explored in a September study conducted by the Mellman Group for Craver, Mathews, Smith and Co., a company that provides direct marketing and other ser-

The Nields to storm the Paradise

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

The Valley has given birth to a wide range of excellent musical acts over the years, and perhaps the best has been folk-rockers The Nields. Their sound and style is hard to pin down, but if you start with the simple acoustic beauty of a the Valley's long tradition of singer-songwriters, throw in a massive amount of power-pop, add a bit of 60's hippie psychedelia, and top the whole thing off with beautiful two-pat harmonies, you can begin to see the sort of unique sound the Nields have created for themselves.

The Nields are a true family business. Vocalist Katryna Nields fronts the band, accompanied by singer/guitarist Nerissa Nields, the sisters' vocal abilities are considerable, and intertwine magically, but both can belt out lyrics in the best tradition of live rock & roll when appropriate. Guitarist David Nields (when he married Nerissa, he took her name) shares songwriting duties with Nerissa, and his gleaming orange electric guitar is the most evident indication that this is much more than another Valley folk outfit. David Chalfant (who recently married Katryna) on bass and David Hower on drums fill out the rhythm section, and the when in full gear, the quintet can create as much sonic energy as any flash-in-the-pan radio band.

And if the Nields have proven one thing, it's that they're around to stay. Their most recent release, 1998's Play is their fifth release (the first on their new label, Zoë Records), and over the course of their career, the Nields have manged to walk perfectly a line between so many styles and musical sensibilities. Their fan base is a mix of pop-loving teenagers, older fans of the sort of vocal harmonies and mature songwriting the Nields offer, and everyone in between; it's a common sight to see teens and parents arrive a Nields concert together, both parties equally devoted.

Any Nields fan will tell you that you cannot understand the appeal of the band without seeing them live. Their albums are excellent, but their live shows are pure musical entertainment. They keep their set lists constantly rotating, and always have an inventive new cover song or two to show off. Their obvious love of performing creates high-energy, very audience-interactive shows that make instant fans out of anyone and everyone.

I recently had an opportunity to talk with Nerissa about their upcoming release, tentatively slated for April 2000. The album will be called If You Lived Here, You'd Be Home, and will feature a wide cast of guest artists, both from the Pioneer Valley and elsewhere in the world of folk-rock. Dar Williams, Moxy Fruvous, Jump Little Children, Beth Amsel, and Ben Demoreth, among others, will make appearances. We can expect a mix of classic "big-ear-candy power pop" Nields tunes, as well as more adventurous forays with arrangements such as vocals and piano only, and vocals with only a string quartet.

The Nields will take the stage at 8 P.M. on Saturday at the Paradise Rock Club in Boston. For tickets, call 617-423-6398.

Thinking of seeing a movie this weekend? Here's your guide to films now in release

The Insider
Playing at Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield

The Insider is a decidedly hard edge look at the world, a story of morals and ethics that wouldn't work without great acting and superb direction. Fortunately, the movie has both. Despite the presence of Al Pacino, this is Russell Crowe's movie. Director Michael Mann (Heat, Last of the Mohicans) paints such a bleak, no-frill landscape that The Insider comes off as a good documentary.

B (Adam Martignetti)

The Bone Collector
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

The Bone Collector is a crime thriller which plays out like nearly every other crime thriller, but which displays enough talent to hold our attention for two hours. Don't expect anything mind-shattering, but if you're in the mood for a solid hunt-down-the-killer movie, The Bone Collector may be worth your while.

B- (David Troupes)

American Beauty
Playing at Pleasant St. Theater

American Beauty takes a fascinating look at the afflictions to be found in middle class culture, the neurotic human drama that potentially plays out behind every white picket fence in America. Beyond providing us with so many colorful, intoxicating characters, American Beauty has a lot to say about American Culture. Materialism, homophobia, the innocence and non-innocence of youth, and the hypocritical nature of American ideals are all present, woven into the characters' internal struggles. A magnificent script is brought to life by wonderful directing and a flawlessly talented cast; this is truly one of the best films of the year.

A (David Troupes)

Double Jeopardy
Playing at Showcase Cinemas, Springfield

Double Jeopardy takes its incredibly lame-sounding name from the legal institution by which someone cannot be tried for the same crime twice. Except for a few instances of humor and a handful of scenes that approached being suspenseful, this movie is barely worth the $3.50 for a Blockbuster rental. Instead, stare at an Ashley Judd poster for a while, and then watch U.S. Marshalls.

C- (David Troupes)

The Sixth Sense
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

The Sixth Sense lies somewhere between psychologically intense realism and science fiction, slowly opening the viewer's eyes to a singularly bizarre arrangement. Bruce Willis gives a surprisingly solid lead performance as Dr. Malcolm Crowe, a clinical psychologist specializing in children, reminding us that he's not restricted to movies like Armageddon and The Fifth Element. Crowe becomes involved with Cole, a troubled young boy who confides in Crowe that he can see dead people.

A (David Troupes)

The Story of Us
Playing at Showcase Cinemas, Springfield

Can a marriage survive 15 years of marriage? A more relevant question: can an audience survive 90 minutes of this movie? Not easily. The Story of Us comes suspiciously close to being "Mad About You" the Movie, except with worse writing and worse character treatment. Ben and Katie Jordan are having problems with their marriage and decide to separate while their kids are away, looking toward respective friends for their help. Unfortunately, The Story of Us never accomplishes more than a shallow treatment of marriage, with a couple of lukewarm laughs thrown in to keep you from falling asleep.

C- (David Troupes)

Bringing Out the Dead
Playing at Showcase Cinemas, Springfield

Bringing Out the Dead takes an eccentric, heavily stylized look at the life of a paramedic struggling for sanity in an insane environment. Nick Cage plays a paramedic consumed by his work; he starts seeing patients whom he didn't save as a result. Although most of the movie is plotless, Bringing out the Dead clearly has something to say about the innate, pointless fragility of humanity and the kindness of euthanasia. Ultimately, Bringing Out the Dead suffers from over-important direction that indulges in its music video-like rhythm, but the picture it creates of the lives of the characters has an undeniably fascinating power.

B (David Troupes)

Fight Club
Playing at Showcase Cinemas, Springfield

You cannot imagine the strangeness that is Fight Club. Edward Norton stars as the movie's nameless narrator – a caricature of the model American citizen. Fight Club's primary function is that of a subversive attack on a society that renders its citizens faceless, impotent drones. The narrator and Tyler, his new anarchistic friend, start Fight Club, an underground arena in which men can reclaim their sense of masculinity and empowerment by beating each other bloody.

vices for nonprofits. The poll, which looked at 800 adults with online access, found that about 44 percent had visited a nonprofit Web site, but only 7 percent had made donations online. However, the study also found that "planned effort" is needed to lure online users to charities' sites.

Shopping can help provide that kind of bait.

This anticipated growth in online giving convinced one strictly nonprofit shopping site to enter the arena as a moneymaking proposition.

Tracey Pettengill, chief executive officer of 4Charity.com, is taking the former purely charity site into the competitive moneymaking fray. 4Charity was started by Pettengill and a bunch of friends while they were MBA classmates at Stanford a year and a half ago, with the team volunteering nights and weekends to benefit the Special Olympics.

"This summer we looked at the site," Pettengill said, and in the face of growing competition, "we were going to get knocked over by all those for-profit sites." She said 4Charity is remaking itself, but still has 50 percent of its shareholders in the nonprofit realm. "We couldn't attract enough good volunteers for full-time work. We needed to attract talented people – we need to give them stock options."

Givers who shop these sites need to do their homework. With the shop-and-give sites, Bennett Weiner, vice president and director of The Council of Better Business Bureaus' Philanthropic Advisory Service, suggested that consumers should demand a prominently displayed disclosure statement that tells how much of a purchase is going to charity.

"It should be up front," Weiner said. "You shouldn't have to search for it."

And, he said, "Don't assume that the money is going to the charity immediately – they may have to meet a minimum, and some sites disburse money quarterly – or less often."

Daniel Langan, director of public information for the National Charities Information Bureau, said he knew of at least one charity shopping site that had gone out of business earlier this year. But on the other hand, he noted that recent White House hearings encouraging citizens toward philanthropy had included panelists from GreaterGood.com, which he said earlier had come to the bureau with a proposed "Bill of Rights" for online donor-consumers.

Langan suggested that shoppers look for secure Web shopping sites and privacy policies that protect your information from being sold or shared with other vendors.

"Individuals – and charities, too – should have a clear way to have questions answered or issues resolved. Anybody could put a charity's name on a Web site."

New slot machines appealing to children

By John M. Glionn
Los Angeles Times

Holding his mother's hand, 3-year-old Christian Schilling wanders through the crowded Sunset Station casino, his head turning to take in all the seductive low-lit allure of this decidedly adult domain.

Then he stops cold, transfixed by the oversized slot machine before him, as though he were gawking at the irresistible antics of some Saturday morning TV kids show.

"Hello! Hello! Hello!" chime the unmistakable voices of Moe, Larry and Curly, part of the colorful computerized come-on for the new Three Stooges slot machine being test-marketed at the casino in Henderson, Nev.

Young Christian smiles. But it's Curly's puckish "Nyuk, nyuk, nyuk" that finally does it, enticing the toddler to walk toward the machine, his tiny hand extended.

"Look at him," said his mother, Flora Schilling. "He already wants to play. He's saying 'Mom, hurry up. Gimme a quarter!'"

Concerned about the appeal of such gambling devices to children, Nevada Gaming Control Board officials are eyeing the machines warily. Its five-member commission is considering new regulations that would ban all cartoon characters, comic strip superheroes, kiddie board games and other child-familiar themes from state slot machines.

Under Nevada law, new slots such as the Three Stooges model must be tested and approved by the state gaming board before being permanently introduced to the casino floor.

Themed slot machines aren't new. Prompted by the success of the "Wheel of Fortune" slot introduced five years ago, casinos across Nevada now feature slots based on hip-swiveler Elvis Presley, cutesy 1920s cartoon icon Betty Boop and such board games as Monopoly and Yahtzee.

Along with the Stooges slot, newer machines under study feature likenesses of the Pink Panther, Lurch and Uncle Fester from the "Addams Family" and Monty Hall from the game show "Let's Make a Deal." There's even an "I Dream of Jeannie" slot, in which Barbara Eden's voice consoles losers with a cooing "I'm sorry, Master."

These machines are being eyed for state approval because – while still considered child-friendly – the board found they also have sufficient interest for adults.

Gaming officials point to at least three new machines they have initially denied licenses for because they employ blatant cartoon imagery.

One is based on the cable television cartoon show "South Park" and another on a Saturday morning superhero who board members describe as "a step above the Teletubbies."

The third was a machine called "Easy Street," based on the children's board game "Candyland."

"Now, who on earth could that slot machine be directed toward?" asked gaming control board chairman Steve DuCharme. "If you look on the Candyland game itself, it clearly says it's intended for children between the ages of 3 and 6 years old."

DuCharme says that manufacturers can appeal by resubmitting their license applications to the board.

Recently, the state gaming commission sponsored a hearing attended by the dozen slot-makers that dominate the $5-billion-a-year industry in which members decried the "mad rush to lock up licensing agreements with icons familiar to children."

They say they want to develop regulations so manufacturers didn't dump millions into developing a new game, securing rights to a well-known icon, only to have the game's license denied.

The themed-slot trend began in the mid-'90s with the success of "Wheel of Fortune," which calls out to gamblers with a signature audience shout now so wearily familiar to casino regulars it's known as the "Wheel of Torture."

Still, the game immediately tripled the average slot machine's $100-a-day take and stood out among other slots with such names as "Filthy Rich" and "Reel 'em In."

After that, the race for recognizable icons was on.

DuCharme says the industry may be opening itself up to "Joe Camel" criticism, similar to the shots felt by R.J. Reynolds for using a cartoon icon to market its cigarettes. The minimum age for gambling in Nevada is 21.

"Why direct slots to kids if they can't even play them?" he asked of slot machine makers. "There are many more appropriate images available."

Joe Lahti, president of Shuffle Master, maker of the Three Stooges slot, insisted that the game is by no means directed at children.

"There is absolutely zero intent on the part of manufacturers to draw children into gambling," he said. "To connect Joe Camel with a slot machine is unfair."

Lahti and others say the Camel ads were posted in public, where anyone – including children – could see them. Casinos, on the other hand, are controlled environments where children are not allowed to gamble.

"We understand the board's concern," Lahti said, "and if it's proven that our games draw kids, then we'll rectify the situation."

Critics of the new games say manufacturers and casino operators know exactly what they're doing, placing the kid-friendly games along the routes to children's areas of hotel-casinos.

DuCharme says he is also concerned that such games could find their way to convenience stores and other outlets in a state where gambling machines are ubiquitous.

"Our concern is over young kids standing around in a 7-Eleven or waiting for their parents in some casino – are they going to be captivated by these new graphics and enticed to violate the law?"

Pumping quarters into the Three Stooges slot machine at Sunset Station casino, retiree Velma Sparks said the game's instant recognition with kids concerns her.

"When I saw this game, I said to myself 'Oh no! They couldn't have!'" she said of the slot, situated next to the Monopoly and Betty Boup machines. "Not an image of my childhood. That's sacred."

She points to a huge Stooges marquee with a picture showing Moe using pliers to pull Curly's teeth, an image accompanied by the come-on: "Get your gold here." And another showing Moe slapping Larry with the words: "More fun than a slap on the face!"

"Imagine what these images would do to a young mind," Sparks said. "It's a lure."

Nearby, Lucille Polons of Wilkes-Barre Pa., disagreed, saying the gambling industry is already over-regulated. Children, she said, don't belong in casinos anyway.

"Adults should judge their own actions, and as a parent, I wouldn't bring my kid into a place like this," said the grandmother of four. "If one even suggested they wanted to play a slot, I'd grab them by the scruff of the neck and say 'C'mon, we're going.'"

Watching young Christian in action, Flora Schilling already knows the allure such television images have over her impressionable son.

"It's seductive. He sees the same images he sees on TV and immediately he feels right at home," she said. "These manufacturers aren't dumb. I'm sure a lot of market research goes into these machines to attract kids just like my son."

You cannot imagine the strangeness that is Fight Club. Edward Norton stars as the movie's nameless narrator – a caricature of the model American citizen. Fight Club's primary function is that of a subversive attack on a society that renders its citizens faceless, impotent drones. The narrator and Tyler, his new anarchistic friend, start Fight Club, an underground arena in which men can reclaim their sense of masculinity and empowerment by beating each other bloody.

vices for nonprofits. The poll, which looked at 800 adults with online access, found that about 44 percent had visited a nonprofit Web site, but only 7 percent had made donations online. However, the study also found that "planned effort" is needed to lure online users to charities' sites.

Shopping can help provide that kind of bait.

This anticipated growth in online giving convinced one strictly nonprofit shopping site to enter the arena as a moneymaking proposition.

Tracey Pettengill, chief executive officer of 4Charity.com, is taking the former purely charity site into the competitive moneymaking fray. 4Charity was started by Pettengill and a bunch of friends while they were MBA classmates at Stanford a year and a half ago, with the team volunteering nights and weekends to benefit the Special Olympics.

"This summer we looked at the site," Pettengill said, and in the face of growing competition, "we were going to get knocked over by all those for-profit sites." She said 4Charity is remaking itself, but still has 50 percent of its shareholders in the nonprofit realm. "We couldn't attract enough good volunteers for full-time work. We needed to attract talented people – we need to give them stock options."

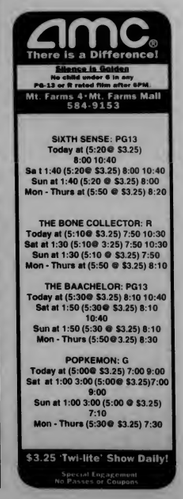
Givers who shop these sites need to do their homework. With the shop-and-give sites, Bennett Weiner, vice president and director of The Council of Better Business Bureaus' Philanthropic Advisory Service, suggested that consumers should demand a prominently displayed disclosure statement that tells how much of a purchase is going to charity.

"It should be up front," Weiner said. "You shouldn't have to search for it."

And, he said, "Don't assume that the money is going to the charity immediately – they may have to meet a minimum, and some sites disburse money quarterly – or less often."

Daniel Langan, director of public information for the National Charities Information Bureau, said he knew of at least one charity shopping site that had gone out of business earlier this year. But on the other hand, he noted that recent White House hearings encouraging citizens toward philanthropy had included panelists from GreaterGood.com, which he said earlier had come to the bureau with a proposed "Bill of Rights" for online donor-consumers.

Langan suggested that shoppers look for secure Web shopping sites and privacy policies that protect your information from being sold or shared with other vendors.



"Individuals – and charities, too – should have a clear way to have questions answered or issues resolved. Anybody could put a charity's name on a Web site."

New slot machines appealing to children

By John M. Glionn
Los Angeles Times

Holding his mother's hand, 3-year-old Christian Schilling wanders through the crowded Sunset Station casino, his head turning to take in all the seductive low-lit allure of this decidedly adult domain.

Then he stops cold, transfixed by the oversized slot machine before him, as though he were gawking at the irresistible antics of some Saturday morning TV kids show.

"Hello! Hello! Hello!" chime the unmistakable voices of Moe, Larry and Curly, part of the colorful computerized come-on for the new Three Stooges slot machine being test-marketed at the casino in Henderson, Nev.

Young Christian smiles. But it's Curly's puckish "Nyuk, nyuk, nyuk" that finally does it, enticing the toddler to walk toward the machine, his tiny hand extended.

"Look at him," said his mother, Flora Schilling. "He already wants to play. He's saying 'Mom, hurry up. Gimme a quarter!'"

Concerned about the appeal of such gambling devices to children, Nevada Gaming Control Board officials are eyeing the machines warily. Its five-member commission is considering new regulations that would ban all cartoon characters, comic strip superheroes, kiddie board games and other child-familiar themes from state slot machines.

Under Nevada law, new slots such as the Three Stooges model must be tested and approved by the state gaming board before being permanently introduced to the casino floor.

Themed slot machines aren't new. Prompted by the success of the "Wheel of Fortune" slot introduced five years ago, casinos across Nevada now feature slots based on hip-swiveler Elvis Presley, cutesy 1920s cartoon icon Betty Boop and such board games as Monopoly and Yahtzee.

Along with the Stooges slot, newer machines under study feature likenesses of the Pink Panther, Lurch and Uncle Fester from the "Addams Family" and Monty Hall from the game show "Let's Make a Deal." There's even an "I Dream of Jeannie" slot, in which Barbara Eden's voice consoles losers with a cooing "I'm sorry, Master."

These machines are being eyed for state approval because – while still considered child-friendly – the board found they also have sufficient interest for adults.

Gaming officials point to at least three new machines they have initially denied licenses because they employ blatant cartoon imagery.

One is based on the cable television cartoon show "South Park" and another on a Saturday morning superhero who board members describe as "a step above the Teletubbies."

The third was a machine called "Easy Street," based on the children's board game "Candyland."

"Now, who on earth could that slot machine be directed toward?" asked gaming control board chairman Steve DuCharme. "If you look on the Candyland game itself, it clearly says it's intended for children between the ages of 3 and 6 years old."

DuCharme says that manufacturers can appeal by resubmitting their license applications to the board.

Recently, the state gaming commission sponsored a hearing attended by the dozen slot-makers that dominate the $5-billion-a-year industry in which members decried the "mad rush to lock up licensing agreements with icons familiar to children."

They say they want to develop regulations so manufacturers didn't dump millions into developing a new game, securing rights to a well-known icon, only to have the game's license denied.

The themed-slot trend began in the mid-'90s with the success of "Wheel of Fortune," which calls out to gamblers with a signature audience shout now so wearily familiar to casino regulars it's known as the "Wheel of Torture."

Still, the game immediately tripled the average slot machine's $100-a-day take and stood out among other slots with such names as "Filthy Rich" and "Reel 'em In."

After that, the race for recognizable icons was on.

DuCharme says the industry may be opening itself up to "Joe Camel" criticism, similar to the shots felt by R.J. Reynolds for using a cartoon icon to market its cigarettes. The minimum age for gambling in Nevada is 21.

"Why direct slots to kids if they can't even play them?" he asked of slot machine makers. "There are many more appropriate images available."

Joe Lahti, president of Shuffle Master, maker of the Three Stooges slot, insisted that the game is by no means directed at children.

"There is absolutely zero intent on the part of manufacturers to draw children into gambling," he said. "To connect Joe Camel with a slot machine is unfair."

Lahti and others say the Camel ads were posted in public, where anyone – including children – could see them. Casinos, on the other hand, are controlled environments where children are not allowed to gamble.

"We understand the board's concern," Lahti said, "and if it's proven that our games draw kids, then we'll rectify the situation."

Critics of the new games say manufacturers and casino operators know exactly what they're doing, placing the kid-friendly games along the routes to children's areas of hotel-casinos.

DuCharme says he is also concerned that such games could find their way to convenience stores and other outlets in a state where gambling machines are ubiquitous.

"Our concern is over young kids standing around in a 7-Eleven or waiting for their parents in some casino – are they going to be captivated by these new graphics and enticed to violate the law?"

Pumping quarters into the Three Stooges slot machine at Sunset Station casino, retiree Velma Sparks said the game's instant recognition with kids concerns her.

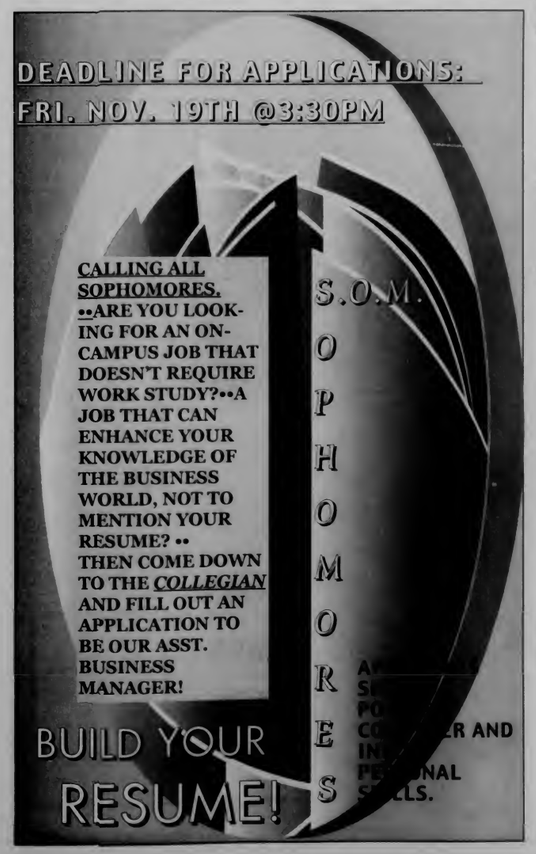
"When I saw this game, I said to myself 'Oh no! They couldn't have!'" she said of the slot, situated next to the Monopoly and Betty Boop machines. "Not an image of my childhood. That's sacred."

She points to a huge Stooges marquee with a picture showing Moe using pliers to pull Curly's teeth, an image accompanied by the come-on: "Get your gold here." And another showing Moe slapping Larry with the words: "More fun than a slap on the face!"

"Imagine what these images would do to a young mind," Sparks said. "It's a lure."

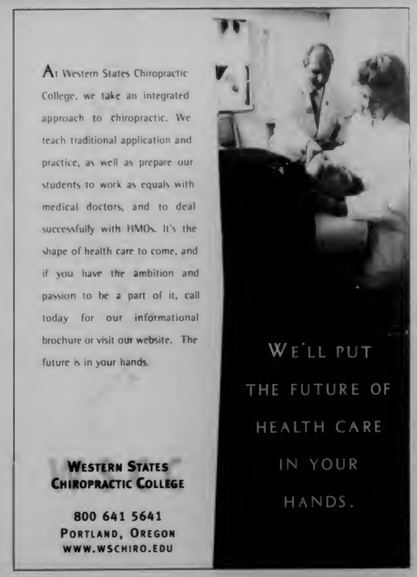
Nearby, Lucille Polons of Wilkes-Barre Pa., disagreed, saying the gambling industry is already over-regulated. Children, she said, don't belong in casinos anyway.

"Adults should judge their own actions, and as a parent, I wouldn't bring my kid into a place like this," said the grandmother of four. "If one even suggested they wanted to play a slot, I'd grab them by the scruff of the neck and say 'C'mon, we're going.'"



Watching young Christian in action, Flora Schilling already knows the allure such television images have over her impressionable son.

"It's seductive. He sees the same images he sees on TV and immediately he feels right at home," she said. "These manufacturers aren't dumb. I'm sure a lot of market research goes into these machines to attract kids just like my son."



Lights out, Guerilla Radio!

Field hockey's Bardell brings power and grace to Minutewomen

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

In a society where sports rule, the athlete is certainly king. In collegiate sports in particular, a participant's prowess on the field can often overshadow his or her very purpose for being in college: to get an education.

In that aspect, Massachusetts field hockey senior Nicole Bardell is a breath of fresh air. The cheerful, charismatic midfielder has maintained such a high standard of excellence in all of her endeavors at UMass that she truly defines what it means to be a student athlete.

The native of Stouffville, Ontario will graduate this spring having risen to and bested every challenge she's faced; Bardell has maintained a place on the Athletic Director's Honor Roll her entire collegiate career, while adding to the storied on-field tradition of the field hockey program.

"Now that it's all coming to an end, it's amazing how much fun I've had over the last four years," Bardell said. "Remembering all the different teammates I've had, and all the great memories that add up, it's amazing."

Amazing is a very appropriate word to describe the 5-foot-4 Bardell. A true natural athlete, she emerged from Stouffville District secondary school as one of its most talented competitors in a mind-boggling number of different sports for the Spartans.

"We were allowed to play as many sports as we wanted," Bardell said. "One year, I played seven: field hockey, basketball, volleyball, softball, track and field, cross country, soccer and ice hockey."

Even as Bardell was pulling off her best Bo Jackson impression, the jack-of-all-trades had established herself as truly the master of one: she was named MVP after leading the field hockey team to the 1995 York Regional Championship. But the two-time school Athlete of the Year also saw a chance to work on her skills apart from her school mates, in a more competitive environment.

"Field hockey was the sport I started playing outside of high school as well," Bardell said. "I played for a club team out of Newmarket, the Hurricanes. It wasn't just high school players, either; there were a lot of players who used to belong to the National Team."

Between competing for the Spartans and the Hurricanes, Bardell was also schooled in the finer points of playing the sport on different surfaces. That made her switch to college hockey, and the American style, quite a simple one.

"It's actually very similar," Bardell said. "Our club played on turf, and from what I've heard from my teammates, the high school game was exactly the same, played on grass. The high school level just isn't as organized; not as many people know that much about it."

Nicole Bardell

What did require a little work was adapting to the whole UMass experience. Bardell joined the Maroon and White at a transitional period for the program, when legendary coach Pam Hixon was in her final year here.

"I had a lot of adjusting to do in my freshman year," Bardell said. "I had a different coach, and a whole different group of players. And then in my sophomore year, when Patty [Shea] came in, I had to adjust again. There was also the transition from high school, and moving here."

Despite all of the factors working against her, Bardell settled rapidly into the program and went to work on perfecting her game. After studying from the sideline during most of her freshman and sophomore seasons, number 4 finally got her time in the sun during the 1998 campaign. Playing primarily from the forward position, Bardell appeared in 13 games, four as a starter, and managed three points (one goal, one assist) and nine shots on goal.

She then began working on the transition to midfield, where her outstanding speed and footwork would help the team shoulder a brutal '98 graduation. By revamping several key areas of her game, Bardell has blossomed into one of the team's most ferocious midfield presences over the '99 season.

"This year, I was better at taking on a defensive role and communicating with other players," Bardell said. "Also in the role of distributor, being able to see the field and get other players involved."

Despite getting a limited number of good looks at goal from her new position, Bardell has nonetheless provided some of UM's most electrifying on-field moments this year. Her goal against Atlantic 10 rival Rhode Island gave the team a humongous lift, while her sliding tackles and between-the-feet dribbling have brought just as much fire to the squad as any statistical accomplishment could.

"Now that I'm adjusted, I feel comfortable at midfield," Bardell said. "I like playing there. You get a lot of glory at forward, scoring goals, but you get a lot of personal satisfaction at midfield knowing that you're helping set up the plays and get the ball down there. Even though you don't see your name as much, it's fun."

Having given such a boost to her teammates throughout her four years here, Bardell's graduation will certainly leave a hollow feeling among the rest of the Maroon and White. But all hope of hanging onto her is not lost; Even as she plots out her future, Bardell has not ruled out staying here at UMass for a while longer.

"That's something that I've been thinking about a lot lately," Bardell said. "I'm pretty much set on taking a year off from school to work, then going to grad school. My first choice is the University of British Columbia, but I'm still researching some other schools. I'm not ruling out the option of staying here, either."

Either way, Bardell seemed destined for academic greatness after a solid four years in Amherst. With a cumulative 3.0 GPA, the Psychology major is proof that striking a balance between athletics and academics can have a huge impact on both aspects of the student athlete's life.

"It's really helped me with time management," Bardell said. "I've had to focus on what I really need to do, and keep everything in perspective."

And establishing priorities is an especially useful skill now, with Bardell and the Minutewomen gearing up to face Boston University in the first round of the NCAA Tournament this weekend. According to Bardell, emotion and execution should go hand-in-hand and could very well be the recipe for success that the Maroon and White needs.

"Everyone is really excited to play BU; we have a score to settle," Bardell said. "It's definitely key that now we're scoring a lot of field goals, because our one goal against them this year was on a corner. We realize now how much ability we have to score from the field, and that puts us up there emotionally."

Regardless of the outcome this weekend, Nicole Bardell has built lasting friendships, based on admiration and respect, within a program that she calls more than just a group of athletes.

"We're so close, we know that we can tell each other anything," Bardell said. "We respect each other for that, and that's something that this program has always had. We've always been like a family, on and off the field."

and some of our young receivers have been coming on."

The Tribe might take a page from Rhode Island's playbook in trying to stop Shipp. Against the Rams, Shipp ran for just 48 yards on 23 carries to put a halt to his consecutive 100-yard streak. William & Mary comes into the contest with the conference's top pass defense, surrendering just 173 yards through the air and just six passing touchdowns.

IMU needed just 32 passing yards to knock off the Tribe, 30-20. Keaton ran rampant over the William & Mary's front seven, compiling 207 yards on 32 carries, as all of the Dukes' touchdowns came on the ground.

William & Mary's David Corley has a chance to become the first freshman in conference history to lead the league in pass efficiency. After an abysmal performance by Miles against the Minutemen, Corley overtook Richmond's playcaller after throwing for three touchdown passes in the Tribe's 24-6 triumph over Rhode Island.

Corley will have to pick his spots with the UMass secondary, who leads the nation with 23 interceptions and are just behind the Tribe in pass defense, giving up just 178 yards through the air.

The UMass defense leads the conference in scoring defense, yielding just 15 points a game against conference opponents, which includes three games in which its adversaries were held to single-digit scoring.

"We are playing with a lot of confidence," Whipple said. "We just have the feeling that if we can get on the scoreboard, our defense will hold."

Linebacker Kole Ayi was recognized for leading the charge for the Minutemen. Yesterday, he was named one of 16 finalists for the Buck Buchanan Award, following in the footsteps of Khari Samuel who was a finalist last season. On average, Ayi is atop the A-10 in tackles, averaging close to 13 tackles per game.

Johnson, a juco transfer from Johnson City, Tenn., scored 15 points and added seven rebounds in 32 minutes of action.

"The kid plays hard. He takes it to the basket, he's quick, you can play him at a couple positions, he's a good defender... he even dove on the floor," Flint said about Johnson. "One of the things we noticed about him when we were recruiting is that he can finish, and that's been one of our problems.

The Minutemen open the regular season next Saturday when they travel to New Rochelle, N.Y. to take on the Gaels of Iona, who were victorious against the Minutemen last season, 66-64, at the Mullins Center.

three and let the coaches decide.

This list is by no means a show of expertise. There are plenty of guys out there playing extremely well; these just happen to be the few I think deserve to shine in Toronto come February.

And on a final, Boston Bruins related note: John Grahame. Having Byron Dafoe back is great, but the young netminder will be missed. He displayed toughness, confidence, and the ability to play with the big boys in his short stay here. Let's hope Boston sticks with this guy, rather than turning him down the road that so many other Boston goalies have gone after a short stay here, the one to nowhere.

UMass Hopes for Eastern Sweep

By Matthew Bencal
Collegian Staff

The No. 11 Massachusetts men's water polo squad will bring its best to the pool this weekend, as the top seed in the CWPA Eastern Championship tournament at the United States Naval Academy in Annapolis, Maryland. The stakes are high and the atmosphere will be tense, as the winner of the tournament will be granted a bid to compete in the prestigious NCAA tournament, where the best of the best will battle for the national championship.

UMass is coming off a successful sweep of the CWPA Northern Championship two weeks ago at Harvard University. UM captured victories over Boston College (14-6), No. 16 Queens College (6-5) and St. Francis (13-7) for the title.

Sophomore Mike Foley and senior Pat Kain held nothing back and fired at will at opponents' nets, registering 12 goals between them. Also active in the scoring department was senior Timmy Troupis, who scored five goals in the romp over Boston College, and senior Rich Slingluff, who netted four bombs in the victory over St. Francis.

Richard Huntley played like the All-American that he is, blocking 27 shots on net throughout the weekend.

Timely goals and strong defensive play will be crucial if UM wants to play in the Championship game on Sunday. The Maroon and White will start the weekend Saturday morning against No. 8 seed George Washington.

Posing the largest threats in the tournament are No. 5 seed Queens College, whom UMass defeated two weeks ago 6-5, and No. 2 seed St. Francis, who has been a thorn in the Minutemen's side all season.

Final Four comes back; Men's rugby faces Army

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's rugby team will look to steal a phrase from the days when John Calipari patrolled the sidelines of the Mullins Center. "Refuse to lose" was last used on a Final Four run in 1996, but a different Final Four altogether invades UMass this weekend.

Instead of the squeaking of sneakers on hardwood, cleats will be ripping through the grass of the Lower Boyden Fields when the Northeast Rugby Final Four takes shape.

The Minutemen will have their hands full in their semifinal match when they take on the Cadets of Army. Army comes into Amherst with one of the country's most potent offenses.

"Army is a very disciplined team," President Dave Wasserman said. "Overall they have been one of the best teams in the country for the last five or six years."

The Minutemen are fresh off a quarterfinal win in which they dominated Syracuse on its own pitch. The final score of 27-20 does not reflect the effort that was put forth by the Maroon and White.

Despite the domination, UMass made numerous miscues, which allowed the Orangemen to stay in the game. "We were almost too pumped up before the game, which made us make a lot of unforced errors," Wasserman said.

If the Minutemen are to continue on to the final, they must play within themselves and not let the emotion of not having played in the Northeast Final Four since 1983 have an affect on their game.

"We're going to have to play a mistake-free game against Army in order to come out victorious," Wasserman said. "We can't make the same mistakes we made against Syracuse and expect to win, we have to step it up a notch." Wasserman continued, "we can't afford any penalties in our own end. Army will capitalize if we have penalties."

"After UMass would pound forward through 5th and 6th phases for 60 yards, they would knock-on or lose the ball and [Syracuse flyhalf] Dave Burt would clear the ball 70 meters downfield," head coach Robert "Doc" Laurence said.

In the match against Syracuse, Tom Westerlind and Rob Sundlin continued their assault of the scoreboard as combined to find the try zone five times.

"Athletically we are on the same level, but there is no doubt that they will be much more physical than we are," Wasserman said.

Depth will be the most difficult thing that UMass will have to contend with when Army storms in. "They can afford to lose a player at every position and it won't affect their game too much," Wasserman said. "They will still be able to play at the same level even if this was too happen."

The Northeast Final Four is uncharted waters for all of the members of the Minuteman squad, but not for Laurence. The 30-year coaching veteran, and head of the Chemical Engineering department, has been in these contests before.

In the other semifinal matchup, Norwich University takes on the Huskies of Connecticut.

Horoscopes

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You don't want to make even the most minor error at the wrong time today. Take care that you know exactly what you are doing at all times.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You must be sure that you avoid the ideological traps today that all aggressively opinionated people can fall into. Listen as well as talk.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You'll appreciate being busier than expected today, as it gives you a reason to put off dealing with a highly stressful personal dilemma.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – A disagreement over fashion and style is likely to erupt today at home. No is the time for you to offer that compromise that all can live with.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – All the signs of something big are right in front of you. Don't hesitate, or you may find that an important opportunity has passed you by.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You may want to reconsider a decision you've recently made. What others think is best for you might actually be the wrong choice.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Now is not the time to change what's been working for you in the past days, weeks, or months. If it doesn't need to be fixed, leave it alone!

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – This is a good day to modify your methods and motives. You can adopt new tactics which will win you greater results when the chips are down.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – This is a good day to reexamine your priorities, and to try and align yourself more accurately with a loved one if necessary.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Your preference may be for simplicity and straightforward efforts, but you're in for something a little more complex and convoluted today.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Don't settle for anything less than you know you can achieve today. Once you say "that's enough" when it isn't, you will begin to decline.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – Don't assume that those around you know what you are up to. Explain yourself when necessary in order to see that all goes smoothly.

I have created a new religian.

If you live a good, honest life you become the opposite of what you actually are.

Therefore, as my life continues, ... I shall become a rich and very attractive person.

I'm counting on this.

Oh, yeah, all those wealthy, good-looking, nasty people... well,... they get theirs.

In my new religion the basic prayer is simple to learn...

"Help help help help help help help help help help... Amen."

Virtual Stars; Bourque still Top blueliner

Seeing as the NHL just recently announced that balloting for the 2000 All-Star game in Toronto has commenced, I thought I'd have a little fun this week and make my very, very early choices for who deserves to make the trip. So, without further ado, the one reason you all woke up today: my 1999-2000 All-Star picks:

Team North America:

Defensemen: Is there really any question of who's starting at right defense for this squad? I don't think so. Raymond Bourque still resides in the upper echelon of the NHL's blueliners, even after 20 years in the league. I'll admit that he's lost a step, and his play at the beginning of the season resembled that of a mere mortal, but as of late he's used his superb hockey sense to make up for any physical shortcomings.

Matt Despres on the mic

With a game on the line, I still want him on the ice.

Starting to the left of Bourque is Los Angeles King Rob Blake. Some may argue that St. Louis Blue's defensemen Chris Pronger belongs here, and they'd certainly have a valid case. However, Blake has found the back of the net 7 times already this season, and has a solid +9 points on the powerplay. He has developed great leadership abilities, and plays the game with a level of maturity that would compliment the style of Bourque very well.

Center: Vincent Damphousse. The race for this spot is a tight one, with players like Joe Sakic and Pierre Turgeon close behind in points. Ultimately though, I'll give Damphousse the nod. He is having a fantastic year in San Jose, and is undoubtedly a big part of why that team is having such a great campaign. He deserves this spot.

Wingers: Dave Andreychuk. Watch him skate, move with the puck, and get in position in front of the net, and you're witnessing hockey the way it's supposed to be played. He's finding the back of the net very well this season, and has given Boston their first legitimate force on the right side since Cam Neely. Ignore the fact that he's in his upper 30's- this guy can still hang.

Paul Kariya. How can you not like this guy? Kariya put to rest the questions of his size a long time ago, and continues to go out and dominate every second he's on the ice. He's also a superb playmaker with great vision and anticipation; he knows where you're going before you do, and will have the puck there waiting.

Goaltender: Curtis Joseph. An 8-2 record, with a 1.73 GAA and three shoutouts is getting the job done. Toronto has been a force this season, and Cujo is certainly one of the main sparkplugs driving the team. I'll take Steve Shields and Chris Osgood as his backups.

World Team:

Defensemen: Sergei Zubov. Three goals and nine assists in 15 games. Sure, it's a better offensive output than most of the leagues forwards right now, but you also won't get much through this guy. At 6-1, 200 lbs., he gets it done at both ends of the ice.

Fredrik Olausson. This Anaheim defensemen is putting together another solid season, and was virtually ignored last year, though he played extremely well. He's getting his share of points so far, but it's his defensive awareness that helped him make this squad.

Center: Jozef Stumpel. I liked him in Boston, and I like him now. Yes, he's hurt, but his play in the early going was outstanding. This may just be a sentimental pick on my part, but I'm fine with that. After all, this is about the guys who are too often overlooked.

Wingers: Jaromir Jagr. This is the guy that goalies lose sleep over. He already has 11 goals and 13 assists this season, a level of consistency that most players can only dream of. He remains the most dominant one-on-one force in the NHL, and maturity has only made him that much better. He'll have this spot until the day he hangs up the skates.

Teemu Selanne. Ok, so this guy is a right-winger too, but this is the All-Star game: compromises can be made. Selanne has some the quickest feet this league has ever seen, and a sense of the game that allows him to keep up. He has 8 goals and 13 assists at this early stage of the year, and an impressive +/- of 11.

Goaltender: Tommy Salo. Take your pick of any season of the past five years, and chances are Dominik Hasek would have had a pretty tight hold on this spot. But the Dominator is hurt, and it couldn't have happened at a more opportune time for the slew of young European netminders who are enjoying great years. The numbers say Salo has a slight advantage over the likes of Arturs Irbe and Roman Turek, but this one is too close. I'll send these

UMass guns for BU in NCAA first round

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Win 10 games in a row, and the chances of you sneaking up on your next opponent are pretty slim.

There will be more at stake than a winning streak, however, when Massachusetts (14-8) squares off with Boston University in the first round of the NCAA Tournament on Saturday. The loser will hang up its sticks for the winter, while the winner marches on.

The Minutewomen last faced BU (17-5) on October 2nd of this year. Despite enjoying a 14-3 shot advantage and a 15-2 penalty edge in that game, the Terriers had to claw back from a 1-0 deficit and barely edged UMass in overtime, 2-1.

"They won the game in overtime, but the numbers in that game were very deceiving," UM coach Patty Shea said. "Shots on goal count if they go anywhere in the direction of the goal cage, but in reality that game was very even. We had the upper hand a number of times during that game."

Saturday's battle will feature a decidedly different Maroon and White squad, however. Gone is the team that relied solely on penalty corners to generate its offense, in its place is a fiery group of players whose aggression within the opposing circle has translated into fantastic field goals. According to UM keeper Zowie Tucker, that attitude should spell the difference between this game, and the last.

"I think we all know that we should've beaten them the first time," Tucker said. "As long as we keep our forwards running, and keep going towards goal, we should be OK. We know they have a weak backfield, but their forwards are quick, so we have to be prepared all over the field."

Co-captain Lucy Koch agrees, and stresses that decisive action by UM's forwards has been the biggest reason for the team's dramatic turn around. After falling to 3-7 with the October loss at BU, the Minutewomen have won 11 of 12.

"The difference is that the forwards are more aggressive in the circle, and are looking to score more," said the Ipswich native. "Everyone is going hard for every loose ball, instead of staying back and assuming that someone else is going to take it.

"It's do or die in the circle," Koch added. "You've got to be hungry to be successful in the circle, and a lot of us have started to do that, getting deflections in."

As the '99 season has passed, the Minutewomen have also benefited from learning their roles within Shea's system. While the team's early season play was marked by many individuals trying to shoulder too much of the load themselves, Tucker points out that the Maroon and White's success has coincided with its ability to function as a collective whole on the field.

"We've all gone about doing our own jobs, instead of trying to do other people's jobs," Tucker said. "We've all been individuals, but we've worked together as a team. The ball motion and everything else within the game we've gotten done as a unit."

That cohesiveness has also translated into better defense for UMass. Six of the Minutewomen's last seven wins have come via shutouts, with the lone goal over that time having been scored on a penalty stroke. That is also a byproduct of playing total team hockey, according to Tucker.

"We're transferring the ball a lot better instead of getting caught in individual defense," the Welsh native said. "We've been a lot steadier and more patient in the backfield, and when we have come up with the ball, we've done a nice, simple pass out."

And while experience has indeed been a friend to this year's team, Koch is quick to note that the team's maturation has also received a shot in the arm down the stretch. According to the junior back, that revamped attitude has made all the difference in the world on the field.

DAN SANTELLA - COLLEGIAN

After blowing by California in Tuesday's play-in game, Patty Robinson and the Minutewomen will rise to the challenge of facing Boston University in the first round of the NCAA Tournament on Saturday.

"Not only is it that everyone's learning how to play together as a team," Koch said. "We're also playing with more confidence. We're able to go places we couldn't go a few months ago, because we're going hard to the ball and really challenging."

Coach Shea also enjoys the luxury of a rock-solid roster, from which a different player seems to step up with every game. While the penalty corner trio of Koch, Patty Robinson and Anke Bruemmer provided the majority of UM's scoring punch during the early goings of '99, an offensive awakening by forwards Lindsay Abbott, Tamra Gerryk and Kristen Schmidt has led to numerous Maroon and White breakaways and field goals down the stretch.

"It's like the floodgates opened," Shea said. "Once you score that first one, and see that you can do it, you start to gain confidence. We're fortunate that we have two ways to score goals, so if they focus on stopping the penalty corner, by not giving them up, we still have ways to beat teams."

With a win Saturday, UMass will advance to play Sunday against either Brown or host Connecticut, which currently holds the No. 2 ranking in the nation. The Huskies are another team that UM played to a standstill this year, setting the stage for a weekend of sweet revenge for Koch and company.

"Of course we have to focus on the game at hand, and beating BU," Koch said. "But I'd love to beat UConn, just to rub it in their faces. They kind of took us lightly, and had the attitude that we weren't anything to worry about. They're a good team, but they're not unbeatable by any means."

Late UM surge axes All-Stars

Shaking off a slow first half, the Massachusetts men's basketball team scored 19 points in overtime to put the lid on the Converse All-Stars, 97-88, Wednesday night at the William D. Mullins Center.

"We played better defense, but there's still we still have to work on," said UMass coach James "Bruiser" Flint. "Guys came out playing better in the second half. The one thing I see that we can do that we couldn't do last year is we can spurt a little bit, we can score some points in bunches."

The Minutemen shot 13-for-38 from the field in the first half for 34 points, a paltry total compared to last week's exhibition match when UMass shot 21-for-40 for 57 points. Struggling to get the running offense started against the All-Stars' zone defense, UM settled into a half-court offense.

"We still have to figure out where the shots are in the zone shot, that's why we were a little tentative, I guess," said Flint.

After taking its first lead of the night, 71-70, with a JoVann Johnson free throw with 5:39 remaining, the Minutemen turned to Chris Kirkland, the only senior on the floor. With Mike Babul and Monty Mack out, Kirkland scored the team's final four points, including hitting one of two free throws to tie the game at 78, sending the game into overtime.

Kirkland, who had 26 last week against California, led the team with 25 points.

Marty Clark gave the All-Stars an 86-85 lead with a pair of free throws with 2:16 remaining. Jonathan Depina, who played a game-high 41 minutes, drilled a 3-pointer to send UMass on a 12-2 run to end the game.

The All-Stars took a 38-31 lead at halftime, behind a 23-24 rebounding advantage, this after getting outrebounded by Hofstra the night before. 52-27. Kiwana Rhaner answered the call, registering 14 points and 15 rebounds after the break, allowing UMass to crawl back into the game.

With 14:51 remaining in the second half and the game knotted at 43 the All-Stars went on a 5-0 run to create some distance. The Minutemen tied the score again at 57 with a Jonathan Depina layup, but once again the All-Stars opened the lead up to 64-59 with 7:24 left after a Theo Johnson jumper.

Shannon Crooks was the low point of the Minutemen's struggles, shooting an abysmal 0-for-23 evening, including three for 13 before halftime. Flint sat Crooks towards the end of the second half, as the Everett native went just 2-for-8 after intermission.

"He's like a freshman, everybody grabbed him and hugged him and told him how great he was last week," said Flint. "I told him that it was just as much mental as it is physical when you're playing basketball so you have to be ready."

UM to face Warriors

Winning the games that it should win is a must for the Massachusetts hockey team. Coming off a weekend that saw them gain a point for a tie with the River Hawks of UMass-Lowell and a 2-1 defeat at the hands of national runner-up New Hampshire, the Minutemen look to joust Merrimack College in a pivotal early season Hockey East contest.

The Maroon and White travel to the Volpe Complex, where last season where it took the only meeting 4-2. The Minutemen swept the season series with the Warriors, posting impressive wins in the two home games.

The Warriors are led by sophomore Greg Classen, who returns to the ice as the leading scorer for the Warriors. Classen was a Hockey East All- Rookie performer last season, posting 14 goals and 11 assists in his freshman campaign.

Senior Sandy Cohen is looking to rebound after a sub-par junior season that saw him light the lamp only 6 times after compiling 24 goals as a sophomore.

Merrimack's defensive stopper is senior captain Drew Hale, who patrols the blue line with an intimidating 6-foot-4, 215 pound frame.

The strong play of junior goalie Markus Helanen has kept the Maroon and White in all of its games this season, compiling a 1-4-1 record.

After a sluggish offensive showing last weekend in Hockey East games, UMass will look to captains Nathan Sell, Jeff Blanchard and Jeff Turner to provide a spark.

The continued strong play of Luke Duplessis along the blue line will help a Minuteman defense. They may be without star Toni Soderholm, who was injured in the Lowell game last Friday.

UM takes on Tribe, hopes playoffs in future

By Brett Mauser

The one-game-at-a-time theory has worked thus far, but there's no doubt that the Massachusetts football team is looking over the horizon and around the nation to see how the postseason is falling into place.

With just two games left and their fate still undetermined, the consensus is that the Minutemen need to win out to lock up their second consecutive playoff berth. Before toeing the line with Connecticut in the season finale at Alumni Stadium, UMass travels to unchartered territory, going head-to-head with the Tribe of William & Mary in Williamsburg, Va.

Two trains collide this weekend as both squads come in red-hot. While the Minutemen have won five straight, the Tribe boasts a 5-1 record in the past six games, its only loss coming to conference-leading James Madison.

"We are really excited about this week. I consider this somewhat of a playoff atmosphere," head coach Mark Whipple said in his weekly teleconference. "None of our guys, including myself, has ever played down at William & Mary. We have never seen their stadium in person. This is November football, and this is what it's all about."

The Dukes stand just a half game ahead of the Minutemen in the race for the conference title. The Minutemen (6-3 overall, 5-1 Atlantic 10) drew a step closer with a 33-6 pasting of Richmond last weekend, led by the A-10's most tightfisted defense. After scoring 27 points or more in five consecutive games, the Spiders could only muster up a late Jimmie Miles touchdown run. Meanwhile, the Minuteman offense continued to gain steam, going up 19-0 at the half and then coasting into the win column.

Despite struggling the past two weeks, Marcel Shipp was named one of 16 finalists for the Walter Payton Award, which is presented annually to the top Division I-AA offensive player in the nation by The Sports Network. Others up for the award include Hofstra's Giovanni Carmazzi, JMU's Curtis Keaton and Lehigh's Phil Stambaugh. This week, he needs just 107 yards to pass Rene Ingoglia as the all-time leading rusher in UMass history.

Breaking records has almost become a broken record for the Minuteman offense and this week should be no different. Last week against Richmond, Adrian Zullo caught 11 passes for a school-record 210 yards, earning him Atlantic 10 Offensive Player of the Week honors for the second time this season. This week, the sophomore has a chance to become UMass' all-time leader in touchdown receptions, last week catching his 16th to join hands with Jimmy Moore atop the charts.

Just two weeks ago, Todd Bankhead became the school's all-time leader in passing yardage by throwing for 322 yards in a 26-19 victory over Delaware.

"I think his fractured wrist had a lot to do with his struggles early in the season," Whipple said. "Lately, he has really thrown well in practice

Continued violence threatens campus security

Third assault reported last night

The University of Massachusetts Police Department is looking for three college-aged men in connection with an assault that reportedly occurred last night around 9:30 p.m. on a sidewalk by the campus pond.

Barbara Pitoniak from the News Office said police are looking for three suspects wearing baggy pants. Pitoniak said two of the three men have been identified as Caucasian and one of the three men was wearing a dark hooded sweatshirt and had an acne problem.

The victim was taken to University Health Services where she was treated and released. The incident is still under investigation.

Amherst College attacks reported

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

AMHERST – A public safety alert has been issued after the Amherst College police received reports of two attempted assaults that occurred on the campus and in the same week during which two rapes on the University of Massachusetts campus were reported.

On Nov. 4 at around 1 a.m., a student was walking in the Valentine quadrangle when she became aware of a man approaching her and ran away. He proceeded to chase her, but no contact was made, authorities said in a Daily Hampshire Gazette article.

A similar incident was reported on Nov. 10. According to authorities, a woman was walking on a dirt path on Memorial Hill around 8:05 p.m., when an unidentified man pursued her from some trees near the Merrill parking lot.

No contact was made and nothing was said by the man in either incident. Authorities have not yet released whether the individual or individuals were armed and dangerous.

In the Gazette article, Amherst College Police Chief John B. Carter said the police have not determined the person's intent or whether the incident was in connection with the alleged UMass rapes.

"We can't say what the person's intent was," Carter said. "I'd like to stress that there's nothing to indicate that those were related cases."

A letter was sent out to the Amherst College community by Health Education Coordinator Karen Jacobus. She said that the close proximity of the two incidents to UMass makes her concerned that they could be in connection with the same individual or group of people.

The Nov. 9 incident at UMass occurred south of the Metawampe Lawn, and the Nov. 2 incident took place east of the campus pond.

A $500 reward is being offered by the Student Government Association for any kind of information leading to the arrest and conviction of the individual or group of individuals responsible for the two alleged rapes on campus.

Both men allegedly involved in the Amherst College assaults have been described by authorities as white males about 6 feet tall, the same basic description given by the two women who reported being raped on the UMass campus.

The Five College Sexual Assault Committee is planning to meet early next week with students. In addition, Jacobus said she encourages students to attend the speakout and vigil "Take Back the Pond – Safety for All" at UMass on Nov. 16 from 12:30-2:30 p.m.

The two UMass incidents remain under investigation by the UMass police.

Proactivity follows fear as response

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

Rape is a crime of violence that uses sex as a weapon, and according to Sonia A. Kiszka, director of health services at Skidmore College in Saratoga Springs, N.Y., it is the fastest-growing felony crime in the United States. One in four women will be raped in her lifetime, Kiszka said. One in eight men will be raped in his.

Kiszka explained that when rape occurs, power is taken away. "The most lost thing for someone who has been assaulted is trust," Kiszka said.

That loss of trust has hit the University of Massachusetts campus, as the community responds to two recent rapes by organizing rallies and vigils aimed at "taking back" the campus.

"It is very unnerving," said Claudine Mallory, a senior women's studies major who has been a counselor/advocate with the Everywoman's Center. Mallory said she feels fear walking on a campus she once saw as safe.

Community responses to the reported rapes have varied. Mallory said she thinks the most vocal response has been from "women who have a certain kind of understanding of violence against women."

The University has responded by urging the community to "do what we can to make our campus a safer place to learn, work and live."

A public safety alert released to the campus community last week by Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Javier Cevallos and Chief of Police John Luippold advised students, faculty and staff to use "good safety sense." Being aware of surroundings, including the location of nearby call-boxes, is a personal safety measure that can be taken.

Cevallos and Luippold also reminded community members to walk with friends, use the Escort Service and park and walk in well-lit areas. Security was also stressed – students should lock their rooms and cars and avoid propping open exterior residence hall doors or allowing unknown individuals into residence halls.

Kiszka also said part of the recovery from rape is getting power back. "Do not become a prisoner of your fears," she said.

According to University of Massachusetts police sergeants who spoke to Residence Life staff in Coolidge Residence Hall last night, for the UMass community, the next steps should be proactive ones.

Campus resources include the Everywoman's Center rape hotline, a confidential line that is staffed 24 hours a day, and which can be reached at 545-0800. The Everywoman's Center Educator/Advocate program also offers workshops on rape awareness, sexual violence on college campuses, violence against women and safety strategies for women. Students respond with campus vigil

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

In response to the two alleged rapes that have occurred on the University of Massachusetts campus in the last two weeks, a group of students held a "Wake Up UMass" vigil on Friday at 4 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union.

Approximately 25 students said the University hasn't done its part to educate the student body on how to deal with issues like rape.

"I just wanted to have a forum where people could come and voice their concerns or whatever ideas they might have on the issue until this person or people are caught," Amit Vachher-Gnanathurai, a sophomore Bachelor's Degree with Individual Concentration major said.

Junior computer science major Erik Volkert said he wanted to create a highway of walking groups or individuals that would be available to walk students back to their dorms during the late hours.

However, senior English major Jess Semeraro said this solution places women in an inferior position and implies a fear of walking alone.

"That's what makes me so angry about this," Semeraro said. "It gives us this feeling of fear everywhere that we can't go out and do this and I want to send a message that we can do these things."

Student Government Association Speaker Mikale Billard said the University of Massachusetts Police Department is urging students not to purchase pepper spray to protect themselves because it is illegal on campus. The self-defense workshops proposed by SGA are alternatives for protection.

Vachher-Gnanathurai said he wants to get the UMPD to offer a workshop on using pepper spray because people should be protected even when these incidents are occurring in broad daylight.

Many students at the speak-out agreed that addressing the issue of rape begins with education. It was agreed that one problem that exists is students don't know the true definition of rape Vachher-Gnanathurai said most students think it has to include some kind of penetration, but this notion is not correct.

According to the Everywoman's Center, rape is any form of unnatural sexual intercourse or sexual intercourse by force and against one's will. Rape is any action that compels a person to submit by threat of bodily injury. It does not necessarily have to involve penetration.

Student trustee Seth Avakian said the University has been very hesitant in releasing information to the public for fear of causing mass hysteria.

UM appoints Eldred as new associate director

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

This fall, Kathryn Eldred was appointed to the position of associate director of communications and marketing at the University of Massachusetts.

According to Kay Scanlan, the interim assistant vice chancellor for communications and marketing, Eldred has a number of duties that come with the position. One of the things that the associate director does is oversee the UMass Magazine and its publication. She also deals with the photographic services, publications, Web development and the Campaign UMass publications.

In addition, Eldred also direct marketing initiatives on campus. She will work with the new UMass logo to promote campus appeal. Scanlan explained that one of the aspects of the job is to "enhance the image of the institution across the state."

One of the reasons that Eldred was chosen for the position was because of her "extensive marketing experience" Scanlan said.

She was formerly the director of marketing at the School for International Training in Brattleboro, VT. The need for this position was discovered by Eldred herself following a study she conducted that determined the school's need to develop a marketing strategy to better position itself for the increasing competition for students.

She began working in that job in 1998, after having worked as director of outreach and recruitment in 1996. She also held the position of acting director of admissions and worked as an admissions counselor after beginning her work at the college in 1994.

Previous to that position, Eldred worked as a marketing services manager at DURA Pharmaceutical located in San Diego. She was also the advertising and marketing director for MEDS Magazine in Atlanta.

She received her formal education at the School for International Studies in 1986 where she received a bachelor of international studies.

Eldred began her position at UMass in mid-October and, according to Scanlan, is a positive addition to the University.

"I think that she is great," Scanlan said. "She will head us into the next era of marketing."

New map design corrects inaccuracies

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

Look at a map and answer the question, "Which is larger, Greenland or Africa?" Seems like an easy question, but one may find that the traditional answer is in fact wrong. Africa is 14 times larger than Greenland.

As National Geography Awareness Week is celebrated this week, the Peters Projection Map is being closely examined. After having looked at the Mercator map, a tool still used today in classrooms everywhere, Dr. Arno Peters created a map correcting the inaccuracies found on that interpretation of the world. The Peters map, which was first introduced in 1985, includes the following changes from the traditional map that society is accustomed to: equal area, showing all areas according to their actual size and equal axis and positions and showing all north-south lines running vertically and all east-west lines running parallel.

These distortions affect the way that people look at the world and even think about the issues that affect the world's people. For example, the effect on the environment from the destruction of the rain forests can appear much more significant when a person sees the true size of South America. Some other areas of the map that have been changed by Peters are directly related to Europe. Europe is portrayed as being larger than South America, when in fact South America is almost twice the size of Europe. On the Mercator map it appears that Germany is in the middle of the map, even though it is actually located at the northern-most quarter of the Earth.

McCollege tour discusses campus privatization

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

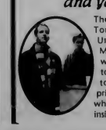
Concerned students discussed the issue of privatization on Saturday during the University of Massachusetts portion of the McCollege Tour.

The tour was hosted by Spencer Parsons and Kyle Henry, former students at the University of Texas, and was sponsored by the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO). Attendees were shown two videos that explained the affects that privatization has had upon other colleges and universities in the United States. Before the videos began, Henry urged those in attendance to consider the potential impact of privatization upon their own university.

"Consider what parallels you can draw," he said.

The first video that was shown was called "Subtext of a Yale Education" and was the story of Yale University's attempts to subcontract. The tale was told by a Yale student and chronicled the struggles of Local 34 and Local 35 both parts of the AFL-CIO labor union to keep both their jobs and their benefits in 1995.

Next students were shown a film entitled "University Inc." that dealt with struggles within the campus of the University of Texas at Austin. In this video students at the University were fighting to prevent a student film complex on campus from being shut down. Both videos demonstrated different types of activism that can be used to fight corporate control on campus.



Following the showings was a discussion debating the best action to take to face privatization on campus. Some attendees expressed a sense of hopelessness towards the threat of private businesses taking up space at UMass.

"They [The Board of Trustees] seem to want to privatize at all costs," one union worker said.

Others in attendance suggested that one way to help prevent privatization would be to improve the quality of already existing on-campus businesses.

Representatives from the tour also gave their opinions on the subject of privatization. Parsons addressed the fact that large corporations want students as permanent customers.

"Their purpose is to gain consumers," he said. "It is really about limiting the competition."

Henry encouraged students to get a copy of the budget so that they could see what the incoming revenue on campus was used for, and could be informed about the budget.

"You'll find that a lot of interesting shifting goes on with the money," he said.

In addition, both encouraged students to become active and to work together towards making a change.

"It's not a time to be polite to these people," Henry said, "it is up to us as students."

The McCollege Tour is set up to try to influence universities to prevent on-campus privatization. The program travels to schools in the United States that are in danger of being privatized and gives advice on what might be the best course of preventive action. This fall, the tour traveled to 12 private colleges and public universities in the country to address the issue of corporate control in academics.

Peters understands that any attempt to represent a three-dimensional object in a two-dimensional plane will create some distortions, but he also said that it should not be misleading. He believes that as we continue into the next millennium, we must look critically at our understanding of the world and use our recent science and technology to create the most accurate map possible.

The Mercator map was created during a time when Europe dominated and exploited the world. Peters believes that the maps were based on this viewpoint and that the world was incorrectly portrayed because of that vantage point. He believes the world is being distorted to the advantages of the European colonial powers. The northern hemisphere is in fact half as large as the southern hemisphere, but on the map it appears to be two-thirds as big. This advantage favors the areas in the north, which at the time were primarily dominated by white people.

The new map, on the other hand, demonstrates the reality of the world, favoring no area in particular. This outlook is used as an important tool for diversity learning in that it represents all countries equally. Many teachers have begun to use both maps together to demonstrate conflict resolution and diversity training. The hope is that with such awareness programs as National Geography Awareness Week, people will become more aware that the way they envision the world may not be completely accurate.

"The Peters Map shows that there are different ways to look at things," Diane LaMountain, a training consultant in Richmond, Virginia said. "I use the Peters and Mercator maps to show that there are two equally valid ways of looking at the world. It unfreezes people's brains, and shows that their world views aren't right or wrong, just different."

The Collegian all staff meeting scheduled for Tuesday 11/16/99 has been indefinitely postponed.

Racial incident over tipping grabs national spotlight

By Mike Clary
Los Angeles Times

MIAMI BEACH – An alleged act of racism boiled over into the streets – and into the national spotlight – this weekend as demonstrators picketed a Thai restaurant whose owner admitted that he added a tip onto a bill simply because the customers are black.

"The issue here is that there is a member of the community who feels free to announce his racist opinions and discriminate against Black people," said attorney Cynthia Everett, president of the Black Lawyers' Association.

For the second consecutive evening, about 100 protesters marched Saturday in front of Thai Toni, which remained closed. Among the signs carried by demonstrators was one reading "DWB – Dining While Black."

"This is a wake-up call for all America," said Democratic state Rep. James Bush III, who took part in the protest organized by the local branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. "Racism is very much alive as we begin the 21st century."

The controversy sparked by Hiromi Takarada, owner of the restaurant in the middle of fashionable South Beach, represents a public relations black eye for greater Miami, where tourism is a $12 billion a year business.

"I've been in this town 30 years and I've never heard of a selective tipping policy based on race or anything else. That's why I was so shocked," said William D. Talbert, president of the Greater Miami Visitors & Convention Bureau, which promptly dropped Thai Toni from its membership roster when the incident became public. "I think we showed that we won't tolerate this behavior."

Turkey's earthquake death toll rises after second hit

By Amberin Zaman and Richard Boudreaux
Los Angeles Times

DUZCE, Turkey – The death toll from Turkey's second massive earthquake in three months swelled to 362 late Saturday as rescue teams spent a second frigid night looking for people trapped under scores of flattened apartment blocks.

Turkey's Health Ministry said that 1,800 people were injured as Friday evening's magnitude 7.2 temblor wrecked several towns in the country's northwest. The number of confirmed dead, which tripled during the day, could rise, officials said, as search crews with jackhammers strip away the rubble of as many as 300 collapsed buildings.

"The destruction is severe," said Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit.

The quake confined its damage mainly to Bolu province but spread shock and dismay across an entire country that thought it had recovered from the worst of nature's fury.

Some of the victims had been living in tents after an Aug. 17 quake damaged their apartments but in recent days had taken the risk of moving back home to escape cold autumn rains.

Bolu, a hilly province 100 miles east of Istanbul, is on the eastern edge of a far larger industrial region ravaged by the August temblor, which measured 7.4 and killed more than 17,000 people.

Much of Duzce, whose 100,000 people were caught at the epicenter, lay in ruins Saturday. The quake tore through a century-old mosque, leaving only the walls standing. Outside the city's damaged hospital, evacuated as a safety precaution, surgeons operated on injured victims in the open air.

Electricity was cut to most buildings in the stricken area to reduce the risk of sparks that could ignite leaking gas.

As evening temperatures fell to 37 degrees, survivors wandered the streets, huddled in a park around fires of wood and old tires or simply packed up and hitchhiked out of town.

Dozens of soccer fans crammed into a truck stop cafe, lighted by its own generator, and exploded in cheers Saturday night as Turkey's national team came from behind to tie Ireland 1-1 in a televised European championship match from Dublin. But many of the spectators raced for the door when the cafe trembled from one of the aftershocks still rippling across the region.

Meanwhile, smoke from blazes ignited by the temblor hung over Duzce and the settlement of Kaynasli, about 25 miles southeast of here.

Among the dead were dozens of people who were crushed in a single apartment during a Muslim prayer service for a dead relative, passengers on a bus flattened by a falling building and 20 people engulfed by fire when the quake toppled a stove in a coffeehouse.

One of three lanes on a stretch of the highway between Istanbul and the capital, Ankara, slid off a hillside. Elsewhere on the highway, near Kaynasli, reporters saw five large trucks on their sides. One, carrying emergency medical supplies, apparently was overturned by an aftershock.

Friday's quake struck at 6:57 p.m., well after dark.

"We were having dinner, and before we knew what was happening, the ceiling fell on us," Hatice Gusdil said as she lay on a stretcher outside Duzce's hospital and wept. Her husband, Hakki, and their son, Cumhur, 14, were killed when their single-story house collapsed.

The disaster added to a lingering humanitarian emergency in the wider area hit by the August quake.

Tens of thousands of people made homeless then are still living in flimsy, makeshift tents despite repeated government pledges that they would be shifted to winterized shelters before the fall rains season began. Many lack access to clean running water.

Our internships aren't easy to get into.

Then again, neither is college.

Congratulations. All the cramming, isomnia and junk food breakfasts have paid off, you're in college now - and soon, you'll be facing questions about your life like what to do with the rest of it. One thing is for sure, if you're a student of color, with an INROADS internship you can have a serious job every summer while you're still in school - making contacts and gaining experience in your chosen field of study. Hey, it won't be easy, but then again if you wanted it easy you wouldn't be reading this right now.

Letters to the Editor

Important public safety alert

To the editor:

On Tuesday, Nov. 2, 1999, at 6:28 p.m., a female University student reported to the University police that she had been raped near the Campus Center Pond. The victim indicated that she was grabbed from behind and forced to the ground by a man wearing a black ski mask with holes for the eyes and mouth. The suspect is described as a white male, 6 feet tall, of medium, muscular build, wearing a black sweatshirt and blue jeans. The man fled toward North Pleasant Street after the assault.

On Tuesday, Nov. 9, 1999, at approximately 2 p.m., University police received a report of an assault that had occurred near the Student Union. The victim advised police that a man grabbed her from behind and pulled her into the bushes adjacent to the sidewalk while she was walking along the sidewalk south of Metawampe Lawn. The suspect assaulted the victim before fleeing from the area. The area was searched by the University and Amherst police.

The suspect is described as a white male, blond hair, 6' 0" to 6' 3" tall, wearing a long-sleeved blue Rugby shirt with a collar and a baseball hat, with no facial hair or glasses. Initially categorized as an indecent assault and battery, this assault is currently being investigated as a rape.

It is important that anyone who has any information or may have been in the area of the Campus Pond and the area adjacent to it along North Pleasant St. between 5:30 and 6:30 p.m. on Nov. 2, or in the area of the sidewalk between the Campus Pond and Metawampe Lawn between 1:30 and 2:30 p.m. on Nov. 9, contact the UMass Police Detective Bureau at 545-2121 or the TIPS line at 577-TIPS.

This is a time for all of us to be alert to our own safety and the safety of other members of the campus community. If you are concerned about your safety, the safety of another person, or would like to talk about these reported sexual assaults, please call the Everywoman's Center rape hotline at 545-0800. This line is staffed 24 hours a day.

You may also wish to contact: Dean of Students Office 545-2684 Employee Assistance Program 545-0350, Mental Health 545-2537, University Health Services 577-5000.

Students who live in the residence halls may also contact Residence Life staff.

It is important for all of us to use good safety sense and do what we can to make our campus a safer place to learn, work and live. Some personal safety reminders:

-Be aware of your surroundings.

-Walk with a friend whenever possible.

-Use the UMass Escort Service.

-Respect your intuition. Don't allow rationality to override your "sixth sense"-it could save you from danger.

-Report any suspicious or unusual activity. It's fine to use the HELP phones for this purpose as well as for emergencies.

-Know where to find HELP phones.

-Use well traveled, well-lit paths whenever possible.

-Lock your room.

-Park your car in a well-lit area and lock it.

-Do not allow unknown persons into your residence hall, apartment or house.

-Do not prop open exterior residence hall doors.

Everywoman's Center and the Student Government Association will be sponsoring a community safety awareness event next Tuesday. We plan to attend and hope you will too. We all need to work together to make our campus safer campus.

Attend a FREE informational seminar with Tom Taylor, the former Chair of the Committee on Admissions for the Association of American Medical Colleges and former med school admissions director with over 30 years of experience. The event, sponsored by Kaplan Educational Centers and UMass Campus Activities will be held on Wednesday, Nov. 17 in Rooms 162-175 in the Campus Center Basement from 4 p.m. - 6 p.m. Remember, before you can go... you have to get in. See you there.

I need an opinion

Paul Kitchin

Good morning children and welcome to the land of make-believe. I have not prepared any lecture for class today, so we're going to have a quiz to make sure you are all doing the reading.

If you could have any super power, what would it be?

Well, I would of course choose to have the Force, there's no doubt about that. The runners-up are super-speed and agility or invincible metal claws coupled with super-fast regeneration. The Force is much more flexible and practical in an everyday sense. Most importantly, I could pull the ubiquitous Jedi Mind Trick ("you do not need to see my identification"). That will pay off in spades next time you get pulled over. Also, I could jump really high and move things with my mind. Haven't you ever wanted to turn a light on or off or shut off that damn alarm clock without getting out of bed? A simple wave of the hand would do just that.

If you could be any animal, what animal would you be?

I would be a squirrel. Those suckers are entrancing. I can't help staring at them when I walk by. They are quick and nimble, able to climb up and down trees at ludicrous speeds. They also squeeze between chain-link fences, and effortlessly jump from branch to branch with whimsy. I would NOT be a so-called "black squirrel." While this breed is a curiosity, they are punks and not even half as cute as the typical lot. They have sickly, sparsely-haired tails instead of big puffy majestic ones.

If I were really ambitious and had been a very good boy this year I would ask to be a flying squirrel, which is my real dream. Why, you ask? Because then I could fly, stoopid.

How many surrealists does it take to screw in a light bulb?

Fish.

If you see black-clad blokes skulking around the Campus Center, please do not stare.

Dammit. Why can I never think of something worthwhile to say? All you out there need to piss me off more so I can rant about real issues and shut up about squirrels. Just be more controversial. Can someone put together another big protest? Maybe you could just say something very intemperate within earshot of me.

Well, that's all of our time for today, boys and girls. Today's column was brought to you by the letter C and the number 4.

Marriage and The Heisman Trophy

Seth Koenig

I had finally come to that fateful point. The point all columnists fear. That's right. I ran out of ideas.

Maybe some of you out there noticed there was no Seth Koenig column in last Monday's issue of The Daily Collegian. I'm sure you cried heartily. Simply put, I had nothing to say, and I couldn't force it anymore. You read the sex story, right? Sad... (that you read it, that is).

Just as I was about to hang up my... uh, keyboard, a ray of light shot down from above. Something omniscient showed me a sign – a sign that said, "Ecris," which is French for, I believe, "Please continue to write for the student newspaper as, I, the omniscient thing, kind of like your stuff."

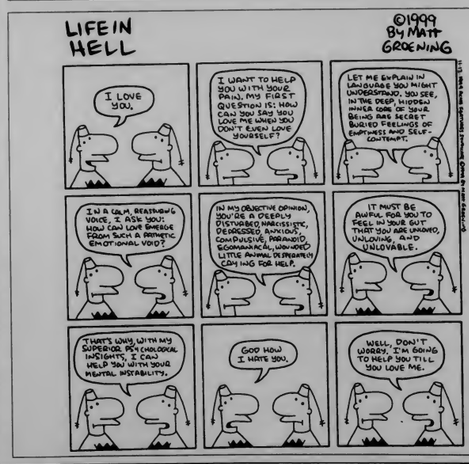
This sign came in the form of a story in Sports Illustrated that my buddy, Matt Vautour, a staff writer for The Daily Hampshire Gazette, brought to my attention about one J.R. Redmond, a former Heisman Trophy Candidate running back from Arizona State. I will explain why I use the term "former" in due time, while explaining right now that I mentioned that Matt writes for the Gazette because it makes me feel more significant as a human being to let 17,000 readers know that I associate with real reporters.

Anyhow, according to the story, Redmond went ahead and took a cellular phone from some girl who, in addition to being his girlfriend, also worked in the school's athletic department – I think for his birthday or something. So far, so innocent.

If you are not familiar with sports, I will let you in on a little secret here that will make this story all the more interesting. The NCAA (which breaks down into "the Committee of People who Make up Ridiculous Rules about Collegiate Athletes") considers anything pleasant that happens to an athlete a major violation of United States Constitutional Law, punishable by death or, in worst-case scenarios, suspension from competition.

Needless to say, accepting birthday presents from one's significant other constitutes something pleasant, and thus, according to official NCAA policy, chapter 18, paragraph two, segment 24, sentence 12, Redmond was in deep feces. A suspension would seriously damage the tailback's chances of winning the coveted Heisman, which, again for those of you unfamiliar with sports, is given to the best college football player in the nation – provided that player is not a defensive player or a lineman, because those people don't seem to be allowed to be considered "the best" for whatever reason.

Anyway, in a nutshell, Redmond was stuck in a precarious position in which he had to find a loophole in the NCAA policy. His loophole? Marry the girl who gave him the phone.



"What?" you ask, flabbergasted. "Marry her? How could that complete life-effecting oversight be a loophole through NCAA policy?"

Well, I answer, according to strict and important NCAA rules, people who decide on a whim to do something stupid, like shoot heroin, swallow razor blades or, say, get married way before they're ready, are exempt from any sort of punishment. Since heroin and razor blades are sort of painful, and would probably keep Redmond from playing up to his Heisman-potential form, he decided to go with stupid choice three.

He and his sort-of belle then hopped over to Las Vegas and tied the knot. Unfortunately, Redmond neglected to read the subsequent chapter of NCAA policy, which states, in legal lingo, "ha ha, we were just kidding about that last part... we were just checking to see if you would actually do that." This part continues to say that, stupid decision or not, people who accept birthday presents would be very likely strapped to the electric chair... or, again, in worst-case scenarios, suspended from competition, which basically knocks him out of the race for the Heisman Trophy. That is why, several paragraphs ago, I said "former." Got it? Good.

Okay, that's enough from me. The moral of today's story is: if you are a Heisman Trophy candidate and you get a cellular phone for your birthday from your girlfriend who is an employee of your school's athletic department, don't marry her unless you really love her, because you'll get suspended for a game anyway, so what's the use?

Messenger is dead on arrival Besson film burns in flames

Milla Jovovich screams her way through the tired The Messenger: The Story of Joan of Arc.

The Messenger: The Story of Joan of Arc
Directed by Luc Besson with Milla Jovovich, John Malcovich
Dustin Hoffmon
Playing at Showcase Cinemas

Poor Joan, or should I say Jeanne with a French accent. She had the potential to be this year's comet hurtling toward Earth. Instead of two summer blockbusters akin to Deep Impact and Armageddon though, we had a miniseries, which was dumb, The Virgin Warrior version starring Mira Sorvino being pushed back to next year, and this – The Messenger: The Story of Joan of Arc. The movie marks the reunion of director Luc Besson with Fifth Element star, Milla Jovovich.

Unfortunately, the emotion of Joan of Arc runs no deeper than that pointless sci-fi flick. Take Saving Private Ryan's gore, subtract Tom Hanks' passion, then strip away any sense of purpose and the remnants make up this half-hearted war drama. Frankly, I sat through two and a half hours of this movie, and not once did I even remotely care about what happened to any of the characters.

Nineteen-year-old Joan has been receiving messages from God all her life. Her mission, as a messenger, is to free France from the invading English terror. Charles VII, the impending king of France, gives her an army. She wins a miraculous victory at Orleans, before being abandoned by the king, who only needed her to gain support from the people. However, she must continue on in God's name.

The problem with Joan of Arc is that it never gives us any reason to become interested. Sure, Joan is a good person, but the moral thrust is never strong enough to make her fierce determination believable. We get powerful wind, strange lights, and cloud formations. There are glimpses of Jesus as a young boy and then again bleeding as an adult, but truthfully it all seems peripheral.

The movie is about war. And from that viewpoint, it is nothing more than tacky. The movie manages to make end-less jokes about Joan's femininity and how it's unexpected by everyone. In the mist of brutal war, we get frivolity. Fifteenth-century soldiers go about using 1990 words like "whatever." There's even one scene where blood can be seen on the camera lens. Did they even care about how the film looked? Milla Jovovich spends most of the movie yelling like a banshee, not acting. These scenes are usually followed by extended sequences of cowering over the destruction that war has wrought.

Director Luc Besson deserves a lot of blame for the movie's shortcomings. After failing to provide any sort of central story, he tries to make amends by tacking on this moral questioning at the end. Enter Dustin Hoffman as Conscience or God or Satan or who even cares. Anyway, Besson makes a mockery of the canonized saint by questioning the validity of her actions. This is particularly ironic since religious zealots have been (unfoundedly) criticizing another weekend opener, Kevin Smith's Dogma. For 45 confusing minutes, the movie makes Joan seem evil, before concluding that she was made a saint 500 years later. It's a good thing, because I could have never guessed.

If Joan of Arc had been about the Revolutionary War, then maybe some patriotism for the United States would have been garnered, but as it is, the movie is devoid of any sentiment. It's hard to imagine that a film could waste both John Malkovich and Dustin Hoffman, but The Messenger accomplishes this with ease. The movie is a complete mess and should have been burned at the stake before being released. D+

Pokemon: The First Movie astounds critics with record-breaking weekend

Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

I don't know what it is. I can't explain it and I'm not sure I even want to try. Pokemon: The First Movie (and oh yes, there will be sequels. Many, many sequels) absolutely crushed the competition at the box office this weekend. The movie, which opened on Wednesday, collected a record $19 million dollars during Wednesday and Thursday before romping to the tune of $32.4 over the weekend (Friday-Sunday).

Its' $10.1 million dollars is a Wednesday box office record for any animated film, easily eclipsing The Lion King's 1994 total of $6.4 million. It was also Warner Brother's largest Wednesday open ever, beating Wild Wild West's $7.1 million high set earlier this year.

Also, its combined five-day total of $51.4 million was the largest non-summer five days ever. A Bug's Life had previously owned this record with $45.7 million over its five-day opening frame last Thanksgiving. Just to throw out some more phenomenal numbers - for Wednesday/Thursday, Pokemon averaged an amazing $6549 per screen with that total increasing almost 50 percent to $10,647 per-screen for the weekend. That number would look fine for something on 500 screens or less; for something on over 3000 (3043), it's how records are broken.

Last week's box office champ, The Bone Collector, would have needed to double its receipts to even come close to touching Pokemon. It did not. Still, the Angelina Jolie, Denzel Washington thriller fell a small 30 percent from last week and collected $12 million for the weekend stint.

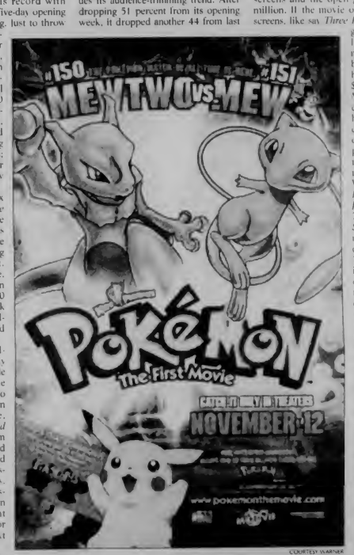
The much talked-about and religiously contested Dogma rode a wave of press (some of it quite negative) to third place. Kevin Smith's latest movie, which stars the Good Will Hunting tandem of Matt Damon and Ben Affleck, collected $8.8 million on a dismal 1260 screens. That's a very impressive $6984 per-screen average, which might open the movie up for wider expansion next week.

Two of last weekend's openers reversed places this past weekend. The Insider, thanks to good reviews and Oscar buzz, fell only 27 percent from last weekend. Michael Mann's "60 Minutes" docudrama collected $5.1 million for the weekend. Meanwhile, Chris O'Donnell's career tumbles further into an abyss as The Bachelor fell 41 percent from last weekend's $8 million to $4.7 and seventh place.

The House on Haunted Hill continues its audience-trimming trend. After dropping 51 percent from its opening week, it dropped another 44 from last week for a $4.4 million weekend.

Two former box office champions have two "the"s and two "of"s in the title) was fourth for the weekend. The poorly received war film made only $6.3 million on a respectable 2147 screens. The $2934 per-screen average is about as bad as the movie. And we finally know that Natalie Portman was not the only reason people went to see The Phantom Menace. The young actress stars with Susan Sarandon in Anywhere But Here. The movie opened to $5.7 million, despite a poor advertising campaign, on 1673 screens. That's a $3407 per-screen average.

Two of last weekend's openers reversed places this past weekend. The Insider, thanks to good reviews and Oscar buzz, fell only 27 percent from last weekend. Michael Mann's "60 Minutes" docudrama collected $5.1 million for the weekend. Meanwhile, Chris O'Donnell's career tumbles further into an abyss as The Bachelor fell 41 percent from last weekend's $8 million to $4.7 and seventh place.



The House on Haunted Hill continues its audience-trimming trend. After dropping 51 percent from its opening week, it dropped another 44 from last weekend's $4.4 million weekend.

Two former box office champions rounded out the top ten. Double Jeopardy edged out The Sixth Sense for ninth place this weekend. Despite strong, new competition and nine weeks in release, the action movie still lost only 31 percent of its audience for $3.1 million over the weekend.

Finally, the resilient The Sixth Sense might have seen its last weekend in the top ten. The film, which has been on the list now for 15 weeks, collected $2.7 million more to bring its gross to date up to $268 million. At this point, its chances of reaching Home Alone ($286 million) or even The Empire Strikes Back ($290 million) are very slim. Still, twelfth place all time is nothing to cry over.

Lessons learned this week. Movies need good screen counts for good box office totals. Witness Dogma. Its $6984 per-screen average was pretty good. Project that out to even a modest 2200 screens and the film opens at $15.4 million rather than $8.8 million. Increase this further to say 2500 screens and the open goes to $17.5 million. If the movie opens on 3000 screens, like say Three Kings, then we get a $21 million open. It's not Pokemon but it's a lot better than $8.8 million. Movies that consistently have low percentage drops over a long period of time make a lot of money. Witness Double Jeopardy and The Sixth Sense. The former movie dropped only 31 percent in its eight week of release, while the latter dropped 45 percent after almost four months of release. That's why percentage drop is so significant. Movies are falling 40-50 percent after only one week in theaters. They never have a shot in order to pack up the big bucks. It's all about opening your picture one week and totals.

I can't wait to see Tim Burton and James Bond to shake things up next weekend with Sleepy Hollow and The World is Not Enough.

Weary Giants visit Amherst College with a decidedly mixed performance

By Kevin Monahan

THEY MIGHT BE GIANTS
Amherst Alumni Gym
Nov. 13

AMHERST — When a band has been touring solidly for over a year and a half, it's impossible for them not to show signs of stress. So was the case with They Might Be Giants Saturday night at Amherst College. It's hard to hold it against them though. A few weeks of touring is too much for some bands.

Though the sub-par performance was not entirely the fault of the band. The major weaknesses in the show were due to the acoustics in the Amherst College Alumni Gym, which, for lack of a better term, suck. Although the size of the venue was adequate, and the high ceilings made for a great effect when the confetti cannon was discharged during "James K. Polk," there should be some serious thought put into reducing unwanted reverberation before any more concerts are planned, memorable selection as the show was brought to an end.

The poor method of sound travel didn't help the somewhat exhausted band when they took stage. Opening with a highly charged rendition of "Spider," then downshifting into a ho-hum version of "Particle Man," They Might Be Giants laid the groundwork for what would turn out to be a disheveled performance. The energy levels were bipolar to say the least. At times it seemed as though they were trying too hard, and other times it seemed as though they were just going through the motions.

John Flansburgh took over most of the responsibility of maintaining the crowd's attention, as John Linnell seemed to be taking an unusually laid-back approach to the evening's events (probably resting up for his solo tour, which began last night in Piermont, NY). Flansburgh wonderfully displayed his vocal range - from baritone to falsetto instantaneously - during "She's Acutal Size," and took over emcee duties for the entire performance.

"S-F-X-X-Y," from 1996's Factory Showroom, was one of the songs that, while fun to sing and dance along to, could have been better executed. In between songs, Linnell and Flansburgh filled time with needless banter. They also had quite a bit to plug: first of all, the MP3 collection Long Tall Weekend, the new website "Radio They Might Be Giants," Linnell's new album State Songs, and his solo tour. The introductions of the individual band members went on a bit too long, and many other attempts at comedy, while funny at first, were milked for as long as possible (much like a "Saturday Night Live" sketch). Still, one of the most amusing moments of the evening was when drummer Dan Hickey emerged to the front of the stage to play the glockenshpiel during the TMBG oldie "Shoeborn With Teeth." Another song from early on in the band's career, "Mr. Klaw," was also performed.

The band wasted no time covering material from the Long Tall Weekend album. "She Thinks She's Edith Head" was the first of the new songs played. Flansburgh's ad-libbing during "Why Does the Sun Shine?" (the first of the many covers in TMBG's repitoire) was hilarious, and his role as a demented conductor was also a nice touch, but (refer to earlier complaint) it went on too long.

"Birdhouse In Your Soul," usually saved for the end of the show, was performed surprisingly early on. The massive conga lines disoricnted everyone in attendance, and "The Guitar" was a memorable selection as the show was brought to an end.

The band returned for two encores which included covers of Cub's "New York City," "Maybe I Know," and finally closing with their most famous cover, "Istanbul (Not Constantinople)." One of the most pleasant surprises of the night was opening band Betwixt, whose punk, funk, and psychedelic pop tunes did their best to rouse an otherwise uninterested crowd. The Boston quartet has played a couple of shows with They Might Be Giants to promote the release of their album, The Salty Tang.

All around, the show wasn't bad. But it is understandable that anyone who has seen They Might Be Giants before might expect a bit more that was given Saturday night.

Alterna-popsters become original

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

The Palladium was absolutely packed Saturday night. 311 played an eagerly-awaited show that had been sold out for quite a while. The popular band, which mixes alternative rock with hip-hop, delivered over an hour and a half of powerful, upbeat music to thousands of fans who were stuffed so close together that some could not even distinguish the person standing behind them from the person standing in front of them.

Any question of 311's decision to play such a small arena was answered within five seconds from when the band took the stage, and lead singer Nick Hexum screamed, "This place is packed!" The band clearly wanted to jam as many people into as small a place as they could, creating an effect that could never be matched at any big arena.

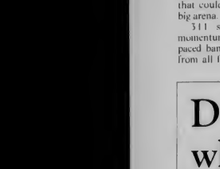
311 started strong, and the momentum never stopped. The high-paced band touched on all of its hits from all five studio albums, but the album that was the most represented was the most recent release, Soundsystem. The fact that the band was definitely there to sell copies of the new album was not hidden. An excellent added touch to the Palladium was the addition of neon posters that advertised Soundsystem hanging from the balcony. When the lights were off, the only thing that could be read from the poster was "311 – Soundsystem."

Though the band tried hard to push the new album, playing "Come Original," "Large in the Margin," "Freeze Time," and "Can't Hide Me," the fans were not disappointed with the representation of their hits from previous albums. They played "Hydroponic" from Music, and from Transistor, "Beautiful Disaster." Off of their most popular, self-titled album, the band played fan favorites, "All Mixed Up," "Down," and "Hive." The crowd screamed loudest when at the end of "Jackolantern's Weather," Hexum said, "My pants almost fell off on that one."

The crowd was certainly a factor in this show. With about two songs left, Hexum started to ask what everyone wanted to hear. The result was "Who's Got the Herb?," which can only be heard on their live album entitled Live. The band used this as their opener for a three-song encore. Before the encore, 311 left the stage after playing a rare track, with a name that can't be printed in the paper, but for all intents and purposes can be called, "It's Time to Get Down." The night ended with the band playing "Feels So Good" from Music. After the show was over, thousands of sweaty fans left the mosh pit, some very bruised and bloody.

Perhaps the only criticism that could be made of the show is the clear amount of violence that was present. During the hour and a half, I watched as two people had their noses busted open, and one man had to become a crowd controller to get everyone away from another person who he didn't even know, who was laid out on the ground. The man turned out to be all right, he just seemed a little bit shaken up. Avoiding the violence seemed to be impossible, since there were so many people there, and you really had no influence over where you went. I stood next to the person who I went to the show with for the first song, and after that, we had no idea where each other were until the lights came on at the end. One of the factors adding to violence was the fact that the crowd was predominantly male. The number of men bouncing around the floor was far more than the number of women, and this is something that would have an effect on what happened. The violence was definitely sparked by the amount of people in such a small place, but this factor also added to the enjoyment of the show. It seems like a double-edged sword to criticize the violence, because it was nice to have so many people, but I hate to see people get hurt.

All together, the show was terrific. It was nice to see such an energetic band fill the crowd with a pumped-up vigor. With the exception of quite a bit of pushing and punching, the fans were great. The music was awesome, and the entire night was certainly worth the long drive to Worcester.



Dr. Dre reinvigorates needing hip-hop while Ani DiFranco fails to move forward

For all its impact in reshaping pop music, and for all its continuing sales punch, rap finds itself in severe need of a creative reawakening at the end of its second decade. Since the death three years ago of Tupac Shakur, the field's new best sellers have tended to be more calculated and contrived than inventive and inspired.

That void makes Dr. Dre's return to action all the more welcome. In 1992's The Chronic, rap's greatest producer expanded the music's horizons by fusing classic '70s funk-soul strains with contemporary beats. The weakness of the album was the frequent vacuousness of its attitudes and language.

In this follow-up (in stores tomorrow), Dre continues to fuse funk-soul and hip-hop, but he's not simply retracing his steps. The beats are fresh and the arrangements, on balance, are even more seductive. Although he continues to surround himself with lots of vocal guests – including Snoop Dogg and, in an especially strong turn, Eminem – Dre also shows more authority as a rapper. The album's most dramatic advances, however, are in subject matter. In key tracks, including "Still D.R.E." and the dynamic "I Orget Dre," Dre, with the help of some co-writers, tells his story in a way that gives the album a convincing, personal side rarely achieved in the generic role-playing that is at the heart of most rap bestsellers.

Some of the tales are boasts about reclaiming Dre's rap crown, but the most affecting acknowledge the darker consequences of an often-turbulent lifestyle. In "The Message," the album's most powerful moment, he speaks poignantly about the loss of his brother, who was killed in a drive-by. The album brings a newly thoughtful edge to Dre's music, however, there is still enough crude and offensive language about women and sex to justify the parental warning sticker on the cover.

You can accept (and even enjoy) some of the hard-core sketches, notably "Ed-ucation," as part of the dark humor tradition of Richard Pryor, one of Dre's heroes. At other times, however, the "bitch" and "ho" talk seems simply pandering, and it detracts from the excellence elsewhere. Even in those moments, however, the production work lulls you as Dre brightens the tracks with distinctive, percolating touches that live up to his reputation as the Quincy Jones and Phil Spector of rap.

Overall, Dion's albums have been tepid, predictable exercises in the sort of pristine bombast that appeals most to adult-contemporary radio programmers. Still, if given a strong enough melody and a seductively sentimental lyric, her crystalline voice can work wonders. This great-hits collection, which features seven new tracks, generally showcases the Canadian songbird at her best. Early singles such as the delicate "If You Asked Me To" and the Peabo Bryson duet "Beauty and the Beast" still have a graceful charm, as does last year's sparkling R. Kelly duet "I'm Your Angel." Even over-the-top numbers such as "It's All Coming Back to Me Now" and the once-inescapable "My Heart Will Go On" (Love Theme From Titanic) sound good a few years after their radio-saturation heydays.

Although the new cuts make up a mixed bag, the highlights are impressive. Dion's version of the Frank Sinatra hit "All the Way" with Ol' Blue Eyes' vocals spliced in - adds nothing to the classic song. But her surprisingly understated rendition of "The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face" is gorgeous, even if it won't make anyone forget Roberta Flack's definitive version. A few original tunes – including the buoyant single "That's the Way It Is" – co-written and co-produced by bubble-gum pop savant Max Martin- are also endearing. Whatever Dion's shortcomings, then, her streak of monster hits surely will go on.

As Queen of the Independents, Ani DiFranco can pretty much do anything she wants, artistically speaking. But that doesn't mean she should. Since her 1990 breakthrough Dilate, a gut-punch meditation on emotional dependence and betrayals that made her and her company role models of pop self-reliance, DiFranco has seemed a bit unfocused.

Of course compared to erratic fellow indie icon the Artist, who is a question unto himself, DiFranco is a beacon of consistency and indeed Teeth showcases her strengths- the loose, conversational-sharp cadence of her vocals, the unwavering commitment to explorations of matters societal and personal, the refusal to be pinned into a genre.

But she jumps around too much. On the title track, an assessment of violence in our culture at the edge of the millennium, she seems to have bitten off more than she can chew and then abandons the topic. "Soft Shoulder," a strong probe of emotional need, seems merely like a Dilate leftover. Similarly, the music skips from the distinctive folk-shuffle of To the Teeth accented by compelling horn touches- to the rockier "Soft Shoulder" and on to atmospheric jazz and even hip-hop on "Swing" with guest rapper Corey Parker. Nothing by itself casts doubts on DiFranco's talents but the album fails to tie them together to push her vision forward.

Fountains spring forth to rock AC crowd

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

Fountains of Wayne played to a small but enthusiastic crowd Friday night at Amherst College, and despite a shorter-than-expected set and the poorest opening band I've had the misfortune to witness, managed to send the crowd away smiling.

The pop-rockers, sporting a new guitarist and a touring keyboardist, opened with two songs from their first, self-titled album, "I've Got A Flair" and "Please Don't Rock Me Tonight" before moving on to "Red Dragon Tattoo" from their new album, Utopia Parkway.

Their set really took off, however, with their fourth song, "Barbara H.," from their earlier record; the momentum of this tune, and the opportunity for their new guitarist to show off his talent, brought the energy of the show up considerably. Another highlight was "Troubled Times," one of the most bittersweet, sappy-but-effective high school love songs you'll find, and a good example of how Fountains of Wayne can switch gears smoothly from electric rock-and-roll to a softer, acoustic guitar-and-keyboards arrangement.

During their most recognizable, radio-friendly song, "Radiation Vibe" (which lead singer/guitarist Chris Collingwood introduced as an "obscure b-side") the band blended bits of several classic rock songs together, stretching what would otherwise be a three-minute song into an entertaining eight minutes of rock's greatest hits.

Band leaders Collingwood and bassist Adam Schlesinger did their best to entertain the crowd between songs. The low point was Chris's off-the-cuff attempt at humor: "Two peanuts walked into bar, and one was a salted." The high point was a story of how, when Chris and Adam were attending Williams College together, R.E.M. stole all of their school's hockey equipment.

After their first set, the band came returned to the stage for a brief two-song encore, playing "Laser Show" from Utopia Parkway and "Joe Ray" from their first album. Most fans, including myself, were disappointed in the omission of songs such as "It Must Be Summer," "Amity Gardens," and "Go, Hippie," all off of their newer record. The set list seemed arranged to emphasize their earlier album as much as Parkway, perhaps more even.

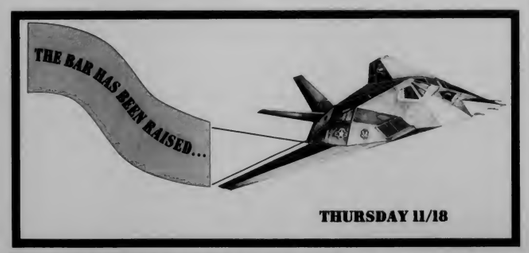
Opening for Fountains of Wayne was Good Samson, a band which seems to have dedicated itself to identifying and giving life to every pop song that never should have been written. Their songs were awkward and needlessly long, their instruments were out of tune, their on-stage shtick was painfully scripted and unfunny, and their vocals were bad beyond my ability to articulate.

Folk rockers Nields advertise new album

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

The Paradise Rock Club in Boston was filled nearly to capacity by the time the Nields took the stage Saturday night, and when the Northampton-based quintet walked out, the crowd erupted into applause. Acknowledging the audience only with a few uncontainable smiles, they began with "Tomorrowland," off of their most recent album, Play, and then moved directly into "Taxi Girl" off of their 1997 record, Gotta Get Over Greta.

The show, which lasted for two solid hours, began a little subdued. The members had just spent several months apart, working on various projects; only sisters Katryna and Nerissa Nields were actively touring. By the fourth song, however, the Nields had easily slid back into their groove, and the rest of the concert was an absolute pleasure.



Much of the set list consisted of songs which will appear on their upcoming release, If You Were Here You'd Be Home Now, including the "Jack the Giant-Killer," "May Day Cafe," and "Jeremy Newborn Street." The new material demonstrates the band's continuing journey in the direction of poppy rock and roll, but older pieces such as "I Know What Kind of Love This Is" reminded the audience of their folk roots. This song in particular was a treat, beginning with Nerissa Nields singing alone with her acoustic guitar, and escalating over the course of the song with powerful electric guitars and a relentless rhythm section.

Other highlights included the frenzied "Train" and the folky charm of "Easy People," both from Play. Mousse, their self-produced 1998 album of previously unreleased material was represented with "Living It Up In The Garden" (during which guitarist David Nields made use of his wireless amp rig to run through the crowd while playing) and the goofy, ever-changing "Superhero Soup."

The entire show, as can be expected at any Nields show, was high-energy and thoroughly entertaining; the band and their fans have a remarkable relationship of mutual gratitude, which makes for spirited performers and an even more spirited audience. While the crowd was waiting on the street for the doors to open, David Nields walked down the line, passing out candy, and the band repeatedly thanked the audience for their support and devotion.

They closed the show with a cover of Hank Williams's hauntingly beautiful "I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry," which the band has recorded for their upcoming album. The Nields do the song every bit of justice it deserves, and it allows lead vocalist Katryna an opportunity to demonstrate the versatility and power of her singing.

Willie Porter provided a solid opening act, combining the styles of rock, folk, and funk with his unique, acrobatic guitar work.

The Terriers seemed rejuvenated in the early part of the second half, charging hard through UM's traps and moving the ball upfield with authority. McDavitt made a bold move to goal at the 31:30 mark that looked promising, until a marvelous sweep-clear by UM's Lucy Koch ended the BU threat. Terrier Jessica Alcorta came up with a steal to set up another BU penalty corner with 28:57 to play, but the unflappable Tucker smothered the ensuing shot to send Boston away hungry yet again.

"Zowie made some great plays defensively on corners that led to some really key saves in this game," Shea said. "That kept us in there, and then we started to get the momentum back."

Play got noticeably more intense with roughly 20 minutes to play in regulation. UM's Sarah Bohonowicz first leveled Boston's Kelly Clothier, then Bardell got a little redemption by running over Terrier Robyn Kenney. Play was stopped as both teams were warned, but Boston coach Sally Starr saw a possibly dangerous situation developing and called timeout with 15:22 remaining.

"We were starting to get distracted by the physicality of the game," Starr said. "I called the timeout to give us a little bit of a breather, and get us focused back on playing hockey."

Both teams seemed to settle down after the break, until UM forward Erika Whitsted drew a yellow card, and an ejection, after colliding with a BU player around midfield. Although weary of having to play a man down, Shea viewed the contact as incidental.

"Out there, players are just doing what they have to do to get the ball," Shea said. "They know it's a tie game, so they want to do whatever it takes to make a play, or stop an opponent that may be generating an attack. With so much on the line, some of that physical play is simply a result of the pressure."

The Minutewomen appeared determined to put the game away over the closing minutes of regulation, as a succession of free hits kept play in the BU end for the final 1:30 of play. But a clear by Terrier Daniel DeCoste killed off the clock, bringing on the sudden-death extra set.

Overtime simply belonged to the Maroon and White. A beautiful steal by UM's Patty Robinson set up the Minutewomen's sixth penalty corner in the 13:27 mark of the extra set, and Bruenmyer's blast on the play skipped over the glove of BU's Susan Harrington and into the goal. As the elated Minutewomen rejoiced in the upset, Starr reflected on how close her team had come, and how Tucker had truly spelled the difference between victory and defeat.

"I thought we played really well," Starr said. "I thought we played well enough to win the game, but UMass' goalie was instrumental in giving them a chance to win in overtime."

■ UConn

liner off the put back, which beat Tucker to stake the Huskies to a 2-0 lead.

"Those early goals were huge," Shea said. "Their team definitely fed off the momentum of those scores."

Shea and the Minutewomen saw their season starting to unravel as the first half became history. Despite going toe-to-toe with the UConn juggernaut over the first 35 minutes of play, UMass had spotted the hosts a dangerously comfortable cushion. Yet even with the lead, the Huskies weren't happy with their play in the first half.

"UMass essentially outplayed us in the first half," UConn coach Nancy Stevens said. "They were more intense, as if they wanted it more."

Stevens' squad made amends in the opening minutes of the second frame, challenging Massachusetts by contesting nearly every pass it made. UM's Jill Fantasia and Kaitlyn Byron set up with dynamic steals for the Maroon and White, only to have the Huskies snatch the ball right back with aggressive double-teams. UConn kept the game going at a breakneck pace, taking its free hits immediately after the whistle and pushing UMass back on its heels.

KAT BRINZEY/COLLEGIAN
Senior Chrissy Millbauer played in her final collegiate game yesterday, as the Minutewomen could not overcome an early 2-0 deficit to knock off UConn.

The Minutewomen would close the gap with four-plus minutes to play, as a wonderful series of dribbling by Byron set up a UM penalty corner at the 74:18 mark. Bruenmyer's rocket of a shot on the play baffled Vile, and cut the UConn lead in half, 2-1. Stevens called timeout with 4:13 to go in the game, as she sensed the tides starting to turn in favor of the Maroon and White.

"Up until that point, we had absolutely controlled the second half," Stevens said. "Once they scored, it was like they woke back up."

Even the preventive measures of Stevens could not quiet the Minutewomen, whose renewed passion led to another penalty corner with only 1:32 left in regulation. This time, though, Bruenmyer's shot found only the glove of Vile, and UM's last shot at glory fell just short. Despite playing the final two minutes of action within striking distance of the UConn goal, the Minutewomen were forced to watch as time ran out on their brilliant '99 campaign.

UM swimming sends BU packing

Men muzzle Terriers; Arsenault, Brown take home pair

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

Winning isn't everything; it's just a heck of a lot better than losing.

They call it a turkey in bowling, a strikeout in baseball, and maybe you can even compare it to a technical knockout in boxing. That is, three in a row. The UMass men's swimming and diving team, coming off a strong 184-98 win over Central Connecticut last Saturday in New Britain, upped its winning streak to three with a 145-96 victory over Boston University on Saturday afternoon.

Juniors Chris Arsenault and Billy Brown, who each won two events on the day, highlighted the meet. Arsenault won the 200-yard freestyle in a time of 1:44.29, and then won the 100-yard freestyle in a time of 47.38. Brown found himself victorious in the 200-yard individual medley by posting a time of 1:57.27. He later won the 200-yard breaststroke, which he timed in at 2:07.79.

"[The score] was supposed to be a lot closer," junior swimmer Chris Arsenault said, "but we all stuck together as a team and we came through."

On the diving board, senior Ed Hefferon, leader of the UMass diving contingent, posted a career best score of 307.95 to win the one-meter event. Hefferon's score ranks third on the all-time list at UMass. Junior Jason Ely placed third in the same event with a score of 240.45. Ely's score made the list at tenth best in school history.

In the 50-yard free, senior sprinter Henry Turner took first place honors for the second time this season with a winning time of 22.17. Last weekend against CCSU, Turner took home first in the 100 free.

Freshman Rob Bellamy won the 200-yard backstroke event in 1:59.98, his first collegiate victory.

It is not that difficult to see that the Minutemen are riding high as of late. In each of their first three events, they have won quite convincingly, while proving their strong ability in the pool. They have been able to control the competition in many key events and watch the scoreboard without any real anxiety.

"We're swimming strong," Arsenault said. "We're a young team and we're doing really well."

The Minutemen return to the aquatic depths next Saturday at 1:00 p.m. when they host the Red Storm of St. John's University at the Joseph R. Rogers, Jr. Pool in the Boyden Building. No one has been able to return and send the Minutemen to the loss column, but UM's next competitor, St. John's, will definitely make a worthy attempt. The women's swimming and diving squad will also host St. John's at this same juncture.

UM will host Columbia University on the following Sunday, Nov. 21st, at 1 p.m.

The team agrees that their toughest meet of the season will take place on Dec. 3 and 4 at the two day Syracuse Invitational against the globally ranked Orangemen. The final 1999 UCM World Rankings placed the Orangemen 400-medley relay squad 26th overall.

Minutewomen zero in, take two from intra-state rivals

By Matt Crocker
Collegian Staff

The queens of the chlorinated waters of UMass left the pool singing "We are the Champions" after its Beantown opponents bit the dust on Thursday and Saturday.

Improving their record to 4-0, the Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team defeated Northeastern University and Boston University this past week.

"We swam very, very well," said head coach Bob Newcomb. "I am extremely pleased with the atmosphere these guys set up for themselves, which was positive, relaxed, yet very intense at the same time when it was time for them to get into the pool and swim their races."

The Minutewomen needed to do some quivering, erasing a late eight-point lead to swim away with a come-from-behind victory against Boston University on Saturday at Rogers Pool. UM rallied when Andrea Spencer took first in the 200-yard IM with a time of 2:11.47 and Newell finished third at 2:14.20.

Entering the final event, the 200-yard freestyle relay, UMass was in a need-to-win situation. With the pressure on, the Minutewomen team of Andrea Kazanjian, Marci Hupp, Anne Detloff and Julie Dragon took home first, clinching the Maroon and White's fourth win of the season.

Keeping the Minutewomen in contention were Elizabeth Risotto, Detloff, and freshman Maggie Curry. Risotto was a two-event winner with a time of 59.84 in the 100-yard backstroke and 2:07.30 in the 200-yard backstroke. Detloff was victorious in the 100-yard freestyle, finishing at 54.64 and Curry won the 200-yard freestyle at 1:58.59.

However, all the action for the days nailbiter of a victory was not just confined to the water. UMass junior Robin Velona set a school record with 265.56, yet only placed second as BU diver set a pool record for the one meter 285.45.

Two meters above the record-setting one-meter performance, Kate Allery also put herself in the record books as she won the event for UM with a score of 286.8. Allery shattered the all-time mark that had stood up since the 90-91 season.

"BU has always given us some great competition. I think we stack up very well with them we are very even," said coach Newcomb. "They have some great athletes we have some great athletes."

Sinking Northeastern on Thursday 140-103, UM handed the Huskies their first loss of the season. Dominating the waters of Rogers Pool, the Minutewomen swam away with the victory easily as Northeastern was left floundering.

Amongst the many Minutewomen who placed in their events on the day, Detloff secured a victory in both the 200-yard freestyle and the 500-yard freestyle. The sophomore touched the final wall with a time of 1:56.24 in her 200-yard event and a 5:04.37 in her 500-yard.

Not to be outdone by their younger teammate, senior Spencer, Risotto and Lisa Lansky won their events as well. Spencer got the win in the 200-yard IM with a time of 2:11.35. Risotto picked up a victory in the 200-yard backstroke finishing at 2:06.30 and Lansky won a 200-yard event of her own with a time of 2:10.02 in the 200-yard fly.

Minutewomen hit the pool again this weekend when they host St. John's on Saturday at 1pm.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – A question of commitment and integrity is likely to arise today, and you have what it takes to come through any personal trial successfully.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You've been looking at the world through rose-colored glasses again, and the time has come today to remove them and see things as they really are.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Despite your efforts, you may not be able to put the crowning touch on a current long-term project just yet. There are still a few loose ends.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Someone who appears to be a rival is really going to prove quite helpful to you before the day is out. The more people you have on your side, the better!

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Things aren't likely to be what they seem at all times today, and you must have the willpower to discern fact from fiction when it counts.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You can avoid a domestic hassle simply by remaining flexible and willing to compromise. Someone may approach you with a surprising offer during the evening hours.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You must be willing to do things for the sake of doing them today, and get your mind off of any possible rewards – at least for the time being.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – A Libra or Aries native will know just what you need to lift your spirits today. Make yourself available for such special treatment.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You must remain calm today, despite any attempts others may make to keep you off-balance. How you acquit yourself now will be quite telling.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You should be able to progress according to plan today, so long as you don't get yourself into something of a bureaucratic tangle.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You'll have an important impact on family members throughout the day. You can be sure that they'll want you to play an active role all day long.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You'll receive a surprise from a friend or loved one today which may ultimately change your life in a profound and permanent manner. Say yes!

UMass lands in field hockey's NCAA Elite Eight

UM shocks No. 13 Boston U

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

STORRS – The skies may have been gray, but the field hockey gods were indeed smiling down on Saturday.

Massachusetts (15-8) exorcised some early season demons by shocking the No. 13 Terriers of Boston University, 2-1 in overtime, in the opening round of this year's NCAA Tournament. BU (17-6) had bested the Maroon and White by the same score in overtime on Oct. 6 in Boston, in a strikingly similar game with a much different outcome.

"It's a great win. We had the momentum early, then we kind of gave it away to BU at the end of the half," said UM skipper Patty Shea. "But we came back hard in the second half, and the outcome shows that."

The opening segments of Saturday's action unfolded in a see-saw battle among the teams' midfielders, as neither squad was able to control the ball and generate much offensive flow. The Terriers seemed intent on jamming UM's forward motion by clogging the passing lanes in the center of the field, subsequently forcing the Minutewomen to go wide.

Sideline slashes by UM's Kristen Schmidt and Tammy Geryk brought the action into the Terrier end, where a sequence of overly-physical play by BU's Felicia Cappabianca gave the Maroon and White its first break.

The BU sophomore forward had fine positioning on UM's Nicole Bardell atop the Terrier circle, when she inexplicably yanked Bardell to the turf and landed on top of her. The result was a UMass penalty corner at the 7:05 mark, in which a nifty stick save from BU freshman Angela Jamieson saved a certain goal off a shot from UM's Anke Bruemmer.

The Minutewomen kept up both their territorial advantage and their attacking pressure over the next two minutes. Another Maroon and White penalty corner with 5:28 in the half resulted in another blocked Bruemmer blast, but this time the Terriers could not clear. UM's Lindsay Abbott took advantage of her opportunistic positioning, and shoveled the ball past Boston keeper Noreen Flanagan to put UMass up 1-0.

The Minutewomen were clearly energized by Abbott's heroics, as teammate Chrissy Millbauer snatched up an errant BU clear and rocketed back toward the Terrier goal with 3:20 before halftime. But the senior's angle proved a bit too sharp, allowing Boston's Samantha Stuart and Casey Holman to sandwich Millbauer and steal the ball back.

The Terriers then built up some momentum of their own, as Cappabianca showed off some flashy dribbling to beat UM's Kerry Ann Jaggassar and set up a BU penalty corner with no time on the clock. Terrier senior Tina McDavitt unloaded a searing slapshot on the resulting play, which beat UMass keeper Zowie Tucker and kicked the contest at 1-1.

After feeling the euphoria of an early lead, UM was suddenly brought crashing back to Earth. But as Shea pointed out, the goal was actually indicative of how well Tucker and company were performing.

"One of BU's strengths is its penalty corner," Shea said. "The plus was that we only gave up one in the half. When we played them during the season, we gave up 15 penalty corners. So we just needed to keep doing what we were doing.

"There's only so much space a goalkeeper can cover," Shea added. "When the penalty corner is executed properly, it's a tough shot to handle. But we knew that we still had an entire half in front of us. We were just back to square one."

Junior Kristen Schmidt played tenaciously on both sides of the ball, but her efforts could not carry the Minutewomen over the undefeated Huskies.

No. 2 UConn too much in end

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

STORRS – Storming into the Elite Eight, they seemed to overflow with passion, pride and desire. But in the end, they ran out of the one thing they truly needed.

Time.

The Massachusetts field hockey team (15-9) exceeded all expectations in its second round NCAA Tournament showdown with host Connecticut. The Minutewomen pushed the No. 2 Huskies (23-0) to the absolute brink, but lost 2-1 when their valiant comeback bid fell just short.

"Discipline was the key to this game," UM coach Patty Shea said. "There were some things we needed to get done out there that we didn't."

On paper, the Maroon and White was somewhat out of its league against UConn. The undefeated Huskies had steamrolled through the Big East conference this season, piling up 89 goals and 264 points while demolishing big-time adversaries like Penn State, Old Dominion and Syracuse. UConn also bested the Minutewomen, 4-1, on Oct. 3 in Storrs.

UMass, meanwhile, had taken a markedly different road to the Elite Eight. After stumbling out of the gate to a 3-7 start, coach Patty Shea's team completed an amazing turnaround that saw it win 10 games in a row to close out the regular season. After bullying California 3-0 in a Nov. 9 play-in game, the Maroon and White stunned No. 13 Boston University in the first round of tournament action Saturday. That set up a date with the host team, which had dropped Brown in another first round game.

Sunday's contest started on a high note for Shea's squad, who stormed into the UConn end with tenacity off the very first whistle. The Minutewomen earned a penalty corner a mere 1:30 into the game, and only a highlight reel save by Husky goalie Danielle Vile kept UMass off the board.

UConn remedied the situation quickly, redirecting play into the UM end and setting up its own penalty corner at the 31:57 mark. A clever delay play followed, but UConn's Katie Stephens mistakenly tried to beat UM keeper Zowie Tucker to her strong side. The Welsh goalie easily deflected the shot, and the Huskies came up empty.

UConn wouldn't have to wait long, however, to find the net. Junior forward Amy Herz took Connecticut's next possession and sliced wickedly along the endline, where she spotted teammate Marya McAndrew lurking off to Tucker's left. Herz flipped the ball neatly past UM's Anke Bruemmer, and McAndrew drove it home to push UConn out front early, 1-0.

"That play was all Amy," McAndrew said. "I was just in the right place at the right time."

The Minutewomen were seemingly unfazed by the Husky goal, and came back with a vengeance on their next possession. Midfielder Nicole Bardell swiped the ball cleanly at midfield from UConn's Laura Klein, then fed forward Kristen Schmidt to key a UMass breakaway. The Greenfield native was swallowed up quickly by the collapsing UConn backs, who sent the ball screaming down the sideline to key another rush back toward the UM goal. Husky Kathryn Tabor appeared to have fantastic positioning to score on the play, but Tucker lunged out of the goal to thwart Tabor's shot and set up another UConn corner with 16:40 to play in the half.

The ensuing shot was cleanly blocked by UM's Patty Robinson, but McAndrew was once again in the perfect spot to make UM pay. The Rhode Island native crushed a low

UMass trounces Tribe, salvages slate behind record-setting Shipp

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

WILLIAMSBURG, VA – Championship players show up to play when the season is on the line.

As has been the case the previous five weeks, a loss this Saturday by the Massachusetts football team against William & Mary at Zable Stadium in Virginia would have made next week-end's matchup against Connecticut a mere matter of pride. A game behind the Minutemen in the Atlantic 10 standings with two weeks left in the 1999 season, the Tribe had dear life to play for when hosting UMass.

According to most people familiar with college football, it would have been stupid for W & M coach Jimmye Laycock to overlook Walter Payton Award candidate Marcel Shipp, the Minuteman tailback responsible for 14 rushing touchdowns and over 1,200 yards entering the contest. Still, it would have been hard for some not to have been questioning Shipp's consistency, with less than impressive showings of 48 and 76 yards, respectively, in the last two games.

The "what-have-you-done-for-me-lately" factions of fans out there might have quickly forgotten the superback's 19 straight 100-yard games, a mark unheard of in the annals of Massachusetts football.

With the season once again on the line, Marcel Shipp made next week's game more than just a UConn-UMass grudge match.

Running with amazing resilience, Shipp remained on his feet through legions of Tribe defenders throughout the contest to singlehandedly hold off William & Mary and finish off the host's postseason aspirations, leading the Minutemen to a 25-16 win.

In a play indicative of the game Shipp had, UMass set up shop on a third and 17 from their own 14-yard line. Looking at a long field, ahead only 18-16, Massachusetts coach Mark Whipple, who later admitted to a first half's worth of bad luck calling plays, decided against throwing the ball, which is the obvious course of action in such a scenario.

With less than nine minutes remaining in the game, the skipper put the ball in the hands of the horse who got him there.

"We were really off-kilter the first half," Whipple said. "Finally, they came in the nickel package, and we thought we could get the counter play on it. Of course, when you've got No. 5, 17 yards is still a lot of yards, but they were playing soft on the pass and we really hit the thing."

Shipp hit the hole with a vengeance, twisting through would-be tacklers by the handful before finally being hauled to the turf by Tribe defender Erik Bengaard at the 34. The play kept the drive alive, eventually ending with 2:27 to go in the game as Shipp crossed the goal line from two yards away to put the score out of reach, 25-16.

The junior would finish the contest with 210 yards and three scores on 35 carries to shoulder his way back into the thick of the race for the Walter Payton Award, given to the top offensive player in Division I-AA football. In the process, No. 5 moved into first place in UMass history in career rushing yards, past the respected Rene Ingoglia.

"It felt good," Shipp said. "The O-Line knew what they had to do and they did it for me. They opened up holes and made it easy for me."

On the other side of the ball, Minuteman linebacker Kole Ayi strengthened his case for the Buck Buchanan Award, handed to the best defender in the country. Ayi, who came into Saturday's game leading the Atlantic 10 with nearly 13 tackles a game, registered only five against the Tribe, but exhibited dominant physical prowess, chasing down speedy W & M quarterback David Corley from sideline to sideline during a landmark second half play before throwing the conference's leading passer to the turf with a strong right arm. The sack ended another of the Tribe's scoring threats to preserve the victory.

As much as Ayi solidified his claim to the individual accolade, teammate Jeremy Robinson controlled the opposing offense from his safety position. Robinson blitzed through the slower offensive line to take Corley down in the backfield three times out of his team-high 10 tackles, a remarkable sack count for a defensive back.

The Tribe's scoring came on the ground, as runners Hameen Ali, who finished with 85 yards, and Marcus Howard, with 22, each finished drives in the end zone for William & Mary.

Marcel Shipp broke out of his funk with 210 yards on the ground to help keep the Minutemen's playoff hopes alive for another week.

UM to head west for NCAAs

By Matthew Bencal
Collegian Staff

The best offense may be a strong defense, and a strong defense may win games, but combine the two, and you have a championship-caliber water polo team.

The No. 11 Massachusetts men's water polo team silenced any rumors of an upset, as the Maroon and White took the prom queen home from the Naval Academy, capturing the Eastern title and a bid to the sacred NCAA tournament. The high stakes, winner-take-all weekend featured a total team effort, highlighted by a versatile scoring attack and stingy team defense.

The leadership of senior co-captains Cory Koenemann at the two-meter position and Richard Huntley in net was evident in the play and success throughout the weekend. The sight of senior Pat Kain hitting the back of the net would prove to be a constant theme throughout the weekend.

You could find the best of the best in the Eastern Conference final round on Sunday. The winner would take the championship home and secure their tickets to sunny San Diego, California, site of this year's NCAA Championships. St. Francis posed a dangerous challenge in the final round, after claiming three of the five Minuteman losses throughout the season. Despite the Terriers' regular season success against UM, the Maroon and White would shine in the 10-7 victory.

Kain would finish the weekend by racking up four more goals, pushing his tournament total to 10. Sophomore Greg Trayer came through in the clutch, shutting the lights off by hitting a pivotal two-point shot in the last minute to put the game away. Sophomore Mike Foley added two more to his credentials, while Huntley stopped the 9-16 shots on net.

The semifinal round would end up being the toughest match of the tournament for the Maroon and White. The water became tainted, as Queens College jumped in the pool looking for an upset. The score would go back and forth all game, the winner earning its right to play on Sunday. The fate of the teams would come down to a sudden-death goal – a Minuteman goal.

Huntley would block a penalty shot in the fourth quarter that would be the difference in the 11-10 UMass victory. Kain was once again the man on offense, leading the attack by netting four shots. Junior Brook O'Neill and senior Timmy Troupis would add two apiece.

George Washington hit the water on Saturday morning, but the Colonials were no match for the Minutemen. The defense led the way, steered by Huntley, who denied 11 of 12 shots on net in a 12-1 romp. UMass decided to space out the scoring evenly, once again proving that anyone on the deep UM squad can find the back of the net. Troupis, Kain, Trayer, Foley and sophomore Antonio Maldonado all had two goals apiece.

UMass improves to 28-5 on the season and has won the CWPA Eastern title six of the past seven seasons. The NCAA primetime tournament will occur on Dec. 4 and 5 at the University of California at San Diego. Last season, the Minutemen headed west, but came home empty-handed, falling in both of their matches.

Warriors power play baffles UMass

By Bryan Smith

Outclassed. That is all there is to it. The Massachusetts hockey team fell victim to the duo of Cris and Greg Classen of Merrimack in a heartbreaking 4-3 loss at the Volpe Complex in North Andover, MA on Saturday night.

Greg Classen scored the game-winning goal early in the third period on a feed from Nick Parillo, while Cris Classen stopped 32 Minuteman shots in the win.

The always-solid penalty-killing unit of the Minutemen surrendered a season high three power play goals in the loss to the Warriors. The loss drops the Minutemen to 1-5-1 (0-4-1 in Hockey East) on the season while the Warriors improve to 3-5-1 (1-3-1 in HE).

What hurts more than the three power play goals allowed is the fact that the Minutemen carried a lead into the third period and subsequently let the Warriors claw back into the game and eventually overtake UMass.

The offense posted a season high three goals, a pair by sophomore Martin Miljko and a short-handed tally by Jeff Blanchard.

The shorthanded goal by Blanchard was his second of that sort for the season, with both coming on breakaways in which he found himself alone at center ice. The native of Stouffville, Ont. made the most of his opportunity by beating Cris Classen through the five-hole. Blanchard's goal evened the game at 2 and the door was open for UM to win the game. Just two minutes later the Maroon and White had one foot through when Miljko fired a shot past Classen to give the Minutemen the lead.

Miljko's second goal of the game gave the Minutemen a 3-2 advantage late in the second period after a scramble in front of the net. The score remained 3-2 into the second intermission, and when the puck was dropped to start the third period, the emotion of the lead transformed into the agony of a loss.

Mike Rodriguez tied the game at 3 with Merrimack's third power play goal, but the Warriors were not done yet. Just four minutes later, Merrimack slammed the door on the Minutemen as Greg Classen slipped a shot past Markus Helanen for the eventual game winner.

UMass' defense got a lift when Toni Söderholm saw his first action since going down with a wrist injury suffered in the 2-2 tie with Lowell. Söderholm contributed not only on the blue line, but for the offense too, assisting on Blanchard's goal and Miljko's second tally of the game.

The Minutemen return to action Friday, Nov. 19, when they take on UConn at the Mullins Center.

Fear unites campus; 250 students convene at vigil

BRIAN MCDERMOTT

Students expressed emotions ranging from sympathy for the victims, to planning for the future, to anger towards the administration, as shown here.

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

A concerned group of students formed outside the Student Union steps yesterday in a speakout/vigil to voice their opinions on what action the University of Massachusetts needs to take to address the stream of assaults that have struck the campus in the past weeks.

The event, "Take Back UMass," was organized by the Baker/Chadbourne/Greenough (BCG) residential area staff. Approximately 250 students came together Monday night to show their support so that the community would not tolerate such violent attacks.

The maroon ribbons that streamed from students' chests signified the need to give back what has been taken from the students at UMass in more ways than one, members of the BCG staff said.

Chris MacDonald, the area residence director (ARD) of BCG, said he wanted to address the men in the audience because it is their presence and support that can prevent such violent acts from occurring.

"Men need to stand up and when we hear other men saying things about it [assault and rape], men need to stand up and say it's not acceptable," MacDonald said. "Think about how you [men] would feel if it was your partner, mother or friend the next time you hear someone saying something about rape."

Tara Misra, a junior psychology and Spanish major, said that as a survivor of sexual assault, she feels like she relives the nightmare each time she hears about an assault.

"Everytime I hear that a woman is sexually assaulted or battered, it happens to me again," Misra said. "I shouldn't have to feel that the only way I can be safe is to stay in my room."

Students asked to know what the administration is doing in response to these concerns. Chancellor David K. Scott and Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs Javier Cevallos said the University administration is trying its best to alleviate the situation. The University has directed workers to trim back the bushes near the campus pond and has increased security in the campus pond area. However, the University has limited funds, Cevallos said, and this situation is preventing them from acting in other effective ways.

Students demanded to know why money hadn't been spent to increase escort service or to provide more lighting and call boxes. Scott said the University needs to look at the long-term solution to the problem.

"Maybe that is the best solution, but we need to discuss with the community whether that is the long-term solution," Scott said. "We're looking at a variety of strategies."

Some students present in the audience said they would rather donate their own personal time to drive the escort vans around campus if it was going to mean that they'd have a safer

Clinton looks to future with visit to Turkey

By James Gerstenzang
Los Angeles Times

ANKARA, Turkey – President Clinton saluted Turkey yesterday as a critical player at the intersection of Europe and Asia, while chiding it gently to continue on a path of respecting human rights and encouraging it to ease tensions with Greece.

Recognizing Turkey's pledge to prohibit torture and protect political rights, the president told the Turkish Grand National Assembly that such progress "will be the most significant sign of Turkey's confidence in looking to the new century, and in may ways, the most meaningful measure of your progress."

In Turkey, respect for human rights has a rough history, with political dissent treated harshly, and the Kurdish minority facing violent repression.

With Clinton at his side, Turkish President Suleiman Demirel acknowledged that "it is impossible to say there is no torture in Turkey; there is torture. But torture is not a state policy."

On a day of singular progress that had long eluded his administration across a spectrum of foreign policy issues, the president broadly pressed the rule of democracy in a corner of Europe where it was born but where respect for it has been lacking.

Over a 24-hour period, agreement was reached in Beijing to bring China into the World Trade Organization. Greek and Turkish Cypriots agreed to resume reconciliation talks, progress was reported in implementing the Good Friday agreement in Northern Ireland, and in Washington, administration and congressional negotiators overcame years of dispute concerning payment of the United States' dues to the United Nations.

Indeed, it is rare after the president has flown all day (as he did Sunday, leaving the White House before dawn for the 10-hour flight here) and slept little (overnight he was woken up in the middle of the night to receive the report from U.S. Trade Representative Charlene Barshefsky that the trade agreement was reached in Beijing) for him to greet his first audience of the day with a smile – and on time.

Nevertheless, he was in good humor, and only 10 minutes late, when he greeted the staff of the U.S. Embassy in Turkey on yesterday's morning with the news that the United States and China had completed the arduous trade negotiations.

Later, Clinton conferred with Demirel and Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit, expressing approval of the limited rapprochement between Turkey and Greece, intensified by the mutual support they offered when earthquakes struck both countries in August.

Clinton's visit prompted a protest in downtown Ankara, where demonstrations are illegal without permits.

The president is spending five days in Turkey, only the third visit by a U.S. president here, following stops by Dwight D. Eisenhower in 1959 and George Bush in 1991. Today he will visit a region devastated by the earthquake on Aug. 17.

Third attack spurs further investigation

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

Following a third attack in less than two weeks, the University of Massachusetts Police Department is still investigating all possible leads.

This past Sunday night, a female student reported that she had been sprayed with a pepper spray-like substance and then assaulted by three unknown assailants, police said. She was near the campus pond at the time.

According to police, the three assailants hit the woman with their fists before she screamed, freed herself and ran from the area. The assailants fled from the woman. UMass Police in the area heard the victim scream and responded to the scene. Meanwhile, the woman had fled to a safety phone by the Campus Center and was reporting the attack when another officer came to help her. The officer on the scene and all other available UMass Police and security personnel, as well as the Amherst Police Department, started a search that turned up a few suspects who matched a description provided by the victim.

No arrests were made. The victim was taken to University Health Services where she was treated for her injuries and released. UMass does not release the names of victims.

The UMPD is looking for three men who stand between five-foot-nine and five-foot-eleven and are between 17 and 21 years old. The first, a white male, weighs between 140-150 pounds and wore a dark-colored pull over sweatshirt with a pocket on Sunday. He also wore dark pants that dragged on the ground. The second, another white male, weighs between 170-200 pounds and wore a brown or red jacket with a ball cap. He also wore dark pants that dragged on the ground. The final individual's race and age is unknown, but he too wore dark colored pants that dragged on the ground, but wore no hat.

"As opposed to the other assaults, this was a physical attack," Barbara O'Connor, UMass deputy chief of police, said. "It occurred in the same area, but there is no evidence otherwise to connect this attack with the others."

In the past weeks, two other students have been attacked, both sexually. On Nov. 2, a student reported being grabbed by a man wearing a ski mask and raped near the Campus Center Pond. The assailant fled towards North Pleasant Street after the attack, which took place between 5:30 and 6 p.m. on the Tuesday night.

The assailant was described as a white male, standing six feet tall with a medium to muscular build. He wore a black sweatshirt, blue jeans and a ski mask.

Last Tuesday, a week after the first assault, a student reported being raped in bushes near the Metawampe Lawn after she was grabbed from behind. The assault was reported at 2 p.m.

The assailant was described as standing between six and six foot three inches tall. He was wearing a long sleeved blue rugby shirt with a collar and a baseball hat. The man had neither a mask nor facial hair.

Also last week, Amherst College issued a public safety alert after two students reported being chased.

On Nov. 4, a woman was chased from the Valentine quadrangle, but the chaser made no contact with the woman. On Nov. 10, a woman was walking on a path near Memorial Hill with she was chased to the Merrill parking lot.

Neither individual made contact with either woman.

O'Connor also said that the UPMD is sharing information with Amherst College in the ongoing investigation.

O'Connor said that rumors were swirling around campus, including one that the attackers were involved in a group called the Sterling Men's Group.

"We have neither indication nor evidence that they are involved in any way," O'Connor said, "but it also can't be ruled out."

O'Connor said that the UMPD was still investigating any and all available angles. O'Connor mentioned that the assaults have caused fear on campus, and she expressed surprise at the assaults herself.

"In my 16 years of experience, nothing has happened like this," O'Connor said. "Not two reported rapes and a physical assault in the same proximity. I haven't seen anything like this."

Court to rule on student-led prayers at games

By Lyle Denniston
Baltimore Sun

WASHINGTON – After resisting school prayer cases for years, the Supreme Court returned to that controversy yesterday, agreeing to rule on the constitutionality of student-led prayers at football games.

A decision, due by next summer, in a case from the town of Santa Fe, Texas, will be the first the court has ever issued on prayers that students themselves choose to recite at school events.

Though the court said it will examine only prayers at high school sports contests, the justices will have to clarify whether it makes a constitutional difference if students, rather than school officials, plan the prayers – an issue that could affect whether students can pray at other school events, such as graduation.

Until now, all the court's rulings on prayers at public schools have forbidden prayer when school officials had a role in arranging it. Since 1962, the justices have barred such prayers, aloud or silent, in a public school setting as a violation of the constitutionally mandated separation of church and state.

In 1992, when the court last ruled on the issue, it voted 5-4 to bar prayers at graduation ceremonies where school officials had made the decision to invite clergy to lead the prayers.

That decision raised the question of whether the court would also deny students the right to opt, on their own, to say prayers at school events. That issue has continued to linger, because the court three times since 1972 has refused to hear cases that could have answered it.

Yesterday, the court appeared to make an effort to show that it did not want to issue a broad new ruling. It confined the legal question it will be answering to group prayer at football games, apparently a long-standing tradition at many Texas high schools. Along the way, however, the justices may well give constitutional guidance about prayers in other school settings.

Texas Gov. George W. Bush, the Republican presidential front-runner, Initial review of Flight 990 recorder yields few clues

By Eric Malnic
Los Angeles Times

A preliminary reading of the cockpit voice recorder from EgyptAir Flight 990 failed to provide any conclusive evidence about what caused the mysterious Oct. 31 crash that killed all 217 aboard the jetliner, investigative sources said Sunday.

The sources said the recording failed to confirm either of two theories why the crash occurred – an attempted suicide by one of the pilots or a violent takeover attempt by someone else on the Boeing 767.

While declining to characterize the nature of the conversation between the two pilots – in Arabic – the sources said there did not appear to be any clear sounds of conflict.

"There was a problem. They were trying to solve it," one of the sources said.

The sources said it's still too early to rule out any theories about what might have happened, including those involving a bomb or some other form of sabotage.

Evidence gleaned from the plane's other "black box" – the flight data recorder – seemed to indicate there were no mechanical problems aboard the jumbo jet before someone or something disconnected the autopilot as the plane cruised at 33,000 feet on a scheduled flight from New York to Cairo, Egypt.

Eight seconds later, the plane began a gradually steepening dive that reached an angle of 40 degrees as the jetliner approached the speed of sound. Inexplicably, the plane's engines were shut down.

During this dive, the plane dropped from 33,000 feet to 18,000 feet according to information gathered from the flight data recorder. At that point, the plane's electrical power apparently cut off. Neither recorder picked up any information after that.

Radar data show the jetliner dropped another 2,000 feet, climbed back up to 24,000 feet and then dived again, apparently beginning to break up before crashing into the sea about 60 miles south of Nantucket Island.

The two black boxes were recovered from the ocean floor by robot submarines working in water 260 feet deep.

The flight data recorder, found early last week, proved to be in relatively good condition.

Kate Lieberman, a sophomore women's studies major, said she and junior STPEC major Adrian Hagemann are organizing a campus pond watch in which students wearing armbands and whistles will be monitoring activity about the area.

"We're organizing a pond watch to have hopefully about ten people patrolling around the pond and student union area during the day and probably through the night," Lieberman said.

"These people will be offering walks to and from class and it will always be a male and a female or two females, but will never be just males."

Jana Jacobson, a senior psychology major, spoke out as a survivor of sexual assault.

"I've dealt with some pretty tough stuff, but I've never been as scared in my entire life than I have been in the past week," Jacobson said. "I encourage people to come out because this is very serious."

added his name to a legal brief by the state supporting the appeal by the Santa Fe school board. That appeal sought a review by the court not only of football game prayers but also of prayers at graduation exercises.

The court appeared to refuse, as it had previously, to review the issue of graduation prayers as a separate issue. As a result, the justices seem to have left intact a federal appeals court ruling that students may choose to pray at graduation ceremonies if they do not recite a prayer identified with any particular faith or deity.

The appeals court, while allowing some graduation-day prayers, flatly barred all prayers at sporting events. Despite that ruling, a student chosen by other students to lead prayers, 17-year-old Marian Ward, has continued to do so at games this fall. School authorities have taken no action to stop her because a federal judge has given her temporary permission to lead pre-game prayer.

Jay Alan Sekulow, chief counsel for the American Center for Law and Justice, a conservative advocacy group that supports school prayers, suggested that the court will try to limit the scope of its ruling to football game prayers.

But, Sekulow said, the case "could have broader implications. This is putting the issue of student-led, student-initiated prayer directly before the court. I don't see how they can ignore that distinction."

The Rev. Barry W. Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, which opposes school prayers, said he believed the court had "set the stage for a major church-state showdown."

Lynn added: "Unless the Supreme Court thinks football is a sacrament, it should find these school-sponsored prayers unconstitutional."

A hearing on the case will be held in February or March, with a ruling by next summer.

Family seeks millions after girl's death

By Lynne Duke
Washington Post

BUFFALO, N.Y. – Put a teen-age girl in a shopping mall and you've got a 1990s match made in heaven. That's how it was for Cynthia Nicole Wiggins. She loved shopping at the Walden Galleria Mall in suburban Cheektowaga and, after her baby was born, she was thrilled to get a part-time job there too.

But her bus line, the number 6, from Buffalo's largely poor and black section to predominantly white Cheektowaga, had been banned from Walden Galleria property.

"They feel it will not bring in the type of people they want to come to the mall," a local transport official wrote in internal documents presented here last week in a state court civil trial.

The Galleria's attorneys say the people the mall wanted to avoid were "riotous youth" who use the number 6 and had caused trouble at another mall nearby. But the mall's exclusion of the number 6 bus meant that passengers like the 17-year-old Wiggins were left off on the opposite side of Walden Road from the mall, with no sidewalks, crosswalks or pedestrian signals, and left to traverse seven lanes of heavy traffic.

There on Dec. 14, 1995, in a freezing rain on a roadway narrowed by snow mounds higher than hydrants, Wiggins wove her way through cars stopped at a red light and was crushed under the wheels of a dump truck.

In a trial that is probing the insidious dynamics of race and class often used to divide the nation's cities from its more affluent suburbs, attorneys for Wiggins's family are arguing that the mall's developers and local transportation officials are responsible for her death because they obstructed inner-city shoppers headed to the mall. Their lawsuit seeks $150 million in damages.

Johnnie J. Cochran Jr., the leader of O. J. Simpson's criminal trial team, is representing the Wiggins family along with local lawyer Robert H. Perk. In opening arguments, Cochran characterized the case as one "about David and Goliath, about the rich and poor, about the haves and the have-nots, those who can speak and those who have no one to speak for them."

Cochran protested jury selection rules that yielded an all-white panel from this western New York county, which is 12 percent black.

Goliath in this case is the Walden Galleria Mall and its developer, the Pyramid Co. of Buffalo. They are represented by Robert P. Watkins of the powerhouse Washington law firm Williams & Connolly, one of whose members defended President Clinton against impeachment charges.

During opening arguments, Watkins portrayed Wiggins as a bus rider who had other choices, who did not have to get off on Walden Road as she did. She could have taken a bus route to another mall that had a shuttle right to the Galleria parking lot, though such a transfer could have added up to 40 minutes to her 50-minute bus ride.

"How she got to the Galleria Mall was her choice," Watkins said. "But the fact of the matter is the mall had nothing to do with the choice that she made."

More than the money the suit could bring, said Wiggins, "I want justice for my child." As plaintiff, he is joined by Rogelio Castellanos Jr., the father of Cynthia Wiggins's now 4-year-old son, Taquilo.

In addition to the Walden Galleria, its developer, the Pyramid Co., and the Niagara Frontier Transportation Authority, Cochran also is arguing that truck driver John P. Bunch, of a company called Majestic Pools, is liable for Wiggins' death. Cochran said in court that Bunch ran over Wiggins due to "inattentiveness."

Bunch's lawyer, D. DeForest Cummings, told the court that Bunch was unable to see Wiggins because of the height of his truck's cab and her proximity to the truck as she wove through traffic.

But the heart of the case centers on internal documents from the transit authority and witness testimony that both characterize statements made by the mall developers about how number 6 bus riders were not wanted at the mall.

Hairs to the future

Ladies and gentlemen, I am oppressed. You may now shower me with financial aid.

No. Just kidding. This column has absolutely nothing to do with anything involving college admissions or anything like that. The subject matter of this column is far more universal, involving the whole of our wretched society and its oppression of (surprise) me. You see, I am, simply because of my genetics, forbidden to ever hold public office in this great land of America.

My opinions go unheeded. I cannot make a direct difference – I must entrust the safety and prosperity of my native land to others who may, in fact, be inferior to me. This is quite simply wrong, and I am not going to take it. Let this column serve as a call to arms to all those who share my condition, that we may unite and take the power back!

Bald men of the world, unite!

Ha, you say. Tee-hee, even. Fine, laugh all you want, but you will know the seriousness of our plight. There was a time when a bald man could be anything – even President. Those times have changed now, and the primary job opportunity for those who are (as we like to call it) follically-challenged are primarily in the fields of pro-wrestling and white trash. And you know what did this to us? Television.

There was a time, not too long ago, when bald men ruled the world. Eisenhower kicked butt all over World War II and then ruled serenely over the whole land as president of this great nation. And what happened? That's right, TV cameras invaded American society, forever exiling us to the fringes of power. They say the turning point in the Kennedy election was the TV debates, where Nixon just "looked uncomfortable" and thus lost the election to the handsomer JFK. Can you imagine what would happen if you put a bald guy in front of a camera on TV and he started sweating? Can you imagine the sheen? He could be the greatest political leader in the history of the Republic, but he'd be laughed out of the building in zero seconds flat.

Rob Schulze

It started in America, but it has slowly diffused to the rest of the world as well. Nowhere is safe. I saw a picture in the paper of former world leaders meeting on the anniversary of the breaking down of the Berlin Wall. I did not just see the fall of Communism in this picture – I saw the end of the reign of the bald. Mikhail Gorbachev and Helmut Kohl, two of the finest politicians the world has ever seen, ousted for losers with full heads of hair. Think about it.

If I were to ask you to name one bald man in public office, who would you say? Jesse Ventura. I believe my case is closed.

You can't hold us down forever, though – oh no! We are everywhere, and soon we will realize our full strength. We are your out-of-shape fathers, your single uncles, your alcoholic grandfathers. We are the creepy homeless guy in the blue pants and the equally creepy dentist that your mother drags you to. We are the biker guy in the leather jacket at the Allman Brothers show. We are the bitter schoolteachers, the fat guy behind you at the football game, the losers placing the personal ads in your local papers. We are at least one fifth of every guy above twenty that you see wearing some sort of a hat. Our numbers are limitless, and when we do come together all will tremble before our mighty strength.

When the Shiny Coalition does rise, things will change. There will be no more of that "take your hat off during the pledge of allegiance" crap. The founders and members of the Hair Club for Men and whoever it was that invented Hair in a Can will be executed without trial. All political debates would be conducted via radio. And what about those standards that say that TV executives have to represent minorities in their shows? They would be extended to include a clause requiring each network to have at least one program where the hot girl sleeps with the bald guy. It would be a brave new world.

Have hope, my brothers. Just because my father and his father lived in a world of oppression and "cueball" jokes doesn't mean that we cannot change the world to better suit our needs. The time to rise has come!

OK, now you can shower me with financial aid.

Rob Schulze is a Collegian columnist.

Letters to the Editor

Students respond to assaults

To the editor:

I am writing in response to a UMass student being raped by a masked man on our campus. Incidents like this, though surprising, are frighteningly common in our society. In fact, one out of every four rapes takes place in a public area. This should not be acceptable, but by doing nothing we are accepting this sad fact.

One out of every four women will be a survivor of rape in her lifetime. She may not tell; she may not want anyone to know. Less than 1/3 of rapes and sexual assaults are reported to police. The social stigma attached to being a "rape victim" is just too imposing.

People may ask her, "did you scream?" and, "did you fight?" No one ever asks a robbery victim, "did you try to fight off the thief?" No of course not, to do so would put the victim's life in danger. Likewise a rape survivor should not have to explain to anyone her actions or be questioned about them. Rape is a violent crime; whatever the survivor did, she did to survive. A frightening 74% of all rapes include threats of or actual physical force.

People may ask her if she told him no, and how many times. Perhaps a better question would be to ask the rapist if she said yes. An extremely drunk or incapacitated person cannot give consent. The implied answer is no. Sex without consent is rape.

One of the most frightening aspects of rape is that the survivor herself may not consider it rape. More than half of all rapes (68%) are committed by someone the survivor knows, while half of these are committed by supposed loved ones: boyfriends, relatives, and husbands. "Date rape" is the most under-reported crime in America because of the standards that exist within our society of what is expected of a woman. There is no situation a woman can put herself in that makes it okay for anyone to have sex with her without her implicit consent. If she goes on a date, kisses a man or woman, even if she fools around with someone it does not mean that she is giving consent to have sex until she says "yes."

And, we must not forget that one out of every 10 men is a survivor of rape or sexual assault. The pressure of society for men to remain quiet about such topics is overwhelming. People may imply that the man is "weak" or "unable to defend himself." Rape is not a sexual crime, it is about power. It is someone gaining control over you, and maintaining it. If someone is going to rape you, chances are they have the means to gain this control over you. In addition to physical force more than 20% of all rapes include weapons, most commonly guns.

Many views in society make it hard to identify yourself as a rape survivor. Some people still subscribe to the "blame the victim" mentality, believing it was due to the way you dressed or where you walked at night. Rape prevention programs perpetuate the myth that rape can be prevented. Like most violent crimes you can reduce your chances of being raped, but you cannot prevent it entirely. Murderers will murder and rapists will rape until we do something to stop them. We may be able to lessen our chances of being singled out as a target, but we cannot eliminate the possibility of being raped until we remove the casual element of violence from our society.

Until then we as a community need to provide support and understanding for those who are survivors of violent crimes such as rape and sexual assault. And we must also let those responsible know that we will not tolerate this violence on our college campus.

Resources exist for those who are rape survivors including the Rape Abuse & Incest National Network (RAINN) 1-800-656-HOPE and the Everywoman's Center 24 Hour Hotline 1-888-537-0800 or 545-0800. For those in the process of healing there are free counseling services provided through the Everywoman's Center. Anyone with information on the above mentioned incidents should notify the UMass Police Department.

To the editor:

I realize that this letter will probably be considered sexist by some, however, I don't agree. Rape is about power. The average male is physically more powerful than the average female. A rapist exploits this paradigm and forces himself on his victim. Yes, women can be stronger than men, and men can rape other men or women can rape men, but that's not the point.

Many people have complained that the administration has not handled the situation involving the sexual assaults well. But it is not the administration that has failed; it is we, the students. Where were we when these brazen attacks occurred?

What's done is done. I'm not telling people to feel bad about themselves for not stopping these attacks; I'm telling them to take action now. I say that every man out there has to make a choice now. Are you a rapist or are you a preventer? Pick a side. I'm not proposing vigilante justice (though I'm not opposing it either), but I want every guy who said he's not going to be a rapist to be on patrol. Yes, there are police out there, but I don't want this rapist (or rapists) to be afraid of a few extra cops stopping him; I want him to fear an entire campus of men that are willing to use any means necessary to stop him from striking again.

I apologize to the women if I seem to be belittling you. Although I have several female friends who I know can kick my ass, I won't encourage the average female to engage the rapist. While the presence of a male may stop the rape right then and there, a women who chooses to put herself in that position may then become a victim. Men would also be putting themselves at risk if they chose to engage the attacker, but the physical pain of getting beat up is nothing compared to the mental damage a woman sustains after being raped.

So everybody get off your butt and make your presence felt. Walk your friends home. Make an extra trip through the center of campus. Keep your eyes and ears open. Let this freak know that there are 10,000 men out there who aren't going to let him get away with this anymore.

To the editor:

Where are we supposed to draw the line? I have had to accept that rape is something I must be afraid of. I have tailored my actions accordingly. I do not go to large parties alone. I do not walk on the "rape trail" near Orchard Hill. I do not linger in dark alleys and shady areas. I resent having to think about these things, but I am not willing to tempt fate just to make a statement. Until I saw the articles in the paper I understood that if I avoided certain behaviors I could consider myself reasonably safe, I don't feel so reassured now.

I cannot count the amount of times I have walked through the center of campus in the evening to go to work, or the library, or just walked around the campus pond to get a break from studying. I am afraid to do that now, and that is the most disheartening experience I have gone through at this University. Women have to restrict their movements enough already without having to call escort services to walk from the Fine Arts Center to the Campus Center at six in the evening.

There has to be some way of stepping up security on campus. Even if it is something so simple as putting in more lights around the street side of the pond, something has to be done so that we can walk around in reasonable safety. Women have too many responsibilities to be afraid of leaving the dorms after the sun goes down. Men do also.

The Collegian vs. the world

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian as you know it, is the biggest and best college newspaper in the Northeast, and I would go out on a limb and say it was better than a lot in the whole country. This is mainly because of a rabidly devoted staff and people who like to do what they are doing. Now, we know that the Collegian is good, but just how good is it? I have decided to do a little comparison of the Collegian to a few other newspapers that I have seen.

The Collegian vs. The Valley Advocate. Although the Collegian does have a classified ads section, they do not have the personal ads that the Advocate does. In some cases this is a good thing because as, you know, a lot of those ads are pretty damn gross, but there are also a few pretty good ones floating around in there too. The Collegian does have a new banner image on the tops of the pages this year, but the Advocate has some pretty cool graphics and a few more colors than the Collegian.

Advantage: Advocate

The Collegian vs. The Minuteman. Surprisingly enough, those wacky dudes at the, "Silent Majority" (read: Republican Club) have put out a pretty respectable product this year. Last year's paper seemed to be written by chimps hopped up on speed, this year's paper has a nice format, decent graphics and layout, and actually has some real content, although, I still disagree with them on most of the political points they raise. Unfortunately for them, the Collegian makes their paper look like a few pieces of single ply, dorm quality toilet paper. The Collegian, being a daily paper covers up to date news, the Republican paper...well, let's just say it's not a daily.

Brian Lohnes

Advantage: Collegian

The Collegian vs. The National Enquirer. This is probably an unfair comparison, but let's be honest, when is the last time you saw a story about a fish baby in the Collegian? I do enjoy perusing through the Enquirer in the check out line because it is a great collection of very creative writing starring a cast of aliens, celebrities, celebrities who are aliens and alien celebrities in rehab. The Collegian tends to shy away from the alien stuff and frankly, they try to report events "truthfully" – whatever that is.

Advantage: National Enquirer

The Collegian vs. The New York Times. The New York Times is a very respected paper, as is the Collegian. The New York Times is also large and clunky to carry around and read on the go. The Collegian is light, smaller and much more practical to read. Both papers have a web-site that is both informative and interesting. Both papers have a multitude of correspondents and a dedicated staff.

Advantage: Tie

The Collegian vs. The Rail Newspaper. The Rail newspaper is like a horror novel to read. There is mystery, suspense, conspiracy and evil in every issue. Then again the Collegian has that every time they report on campus issues. Rail often reports on prisoners and how they are abused. The Collegian reports on how we are getting abused by the administration of the school. Finally, Rail publishes letters from prisoners, writing from prison. The Collegian publishes letters to the editor from students. The quality of the Collegian newsprint is high and screams quality; the quality of the Rail paper just plain screams.

Advantage: Collegian

The Collegian vs. The Boston Globe. First off, what kind of balls do these people think they have calling themselves "The Globe." Let's be honest, it's false advertising, that paper is rectangular just like the rest. The Collegian, on the other hand doesn't make any claims that it can't back up. Globe vs. Collegian in a street fight, Collegian wins hands down. Hell, we have a guy named Boo writing for this paper, beat that. The Globe is also very old and stuffy, on the other hand the Collegian is also old but totally hip and as the French would say, "groovy."

Advantage: Collegian

So there it is, the good old Collegian holds it's own against the big boys of the newspaper business. Every time you pick up this paper, know that there is a staff of hard working people busting their humps far into the night to give you the best product they can everyday. Always remember, there is an outside chance that the Collegian will cover that fish baby story and if that day ever comes, I will be the one writing it.

The unifying force of fear on campus

Returning home from a full day of class I did the usual in checking my messages. With four saved and seven new ones to listen to, I quickly skipped through the ones for my roommate to those pertaining to me. One, marked private, immediately caught my attention. It was sent from my RA and forwarded twice. The message was alerting females of yet another sexual assault on campus. "At 2 p.m. near the Campus Center, a woman was sexually assaulted in the bushes."

2 p.m.? Not only is it light out but it is the Campus Center. At any given time during the day, people are flocking through their rush to get to classes. How could no one see? Where was I? Having realized I was in class, it registered that I also had a one to go to in five minutes. I looked at the clock: 6:25 p.m.

I left my room angry and disappointed. Here I am walking to every class without a care in the world. Sometimes my CD player is blaring and other times the solitude of the cold wind blowing is all the company I'll allow. But now I'm warned to be careful, keep my head up, not to walk alone. This campus is my home away from home – these aren't things I should have to worry about.

My boyfriend urged me to take his car, he flung the keys in my hand but I refused. "Any man whoever tried to rape me would be the sorriest man on the face of the Earth" was my exact response.

Finally I left, I had a way to go and no one to go with me but I wasn't afraid of anything, at least not anything happening to me. My only fear was that the next day I would pick up the paper and read of yet another rape and I would see the time and place and realize it was at the exact moment I walked by. Nevertheless I got to class all right. But I took a mental picture of every male that passed me.

First judging their height with my hair color, clothes, face and features. And I watched each shadow making sure it passed without hesitancy or stopping to turn around.

As I walked parallel to the pond I saw a woman walking near it alone. I think I would have yelled out but I wasn't sure what I'd say. Instead I stayed cautious and alert for both of us and when she finally met up with a friend I felt she was then safe. I sent to all of you ladies my own cautious words: be careful, please. We cannot go to class with someone else and I know this. But if you can find someone you know or trust, walk with them.

Is this any way for of us to live? We need to take back our campus and after that, take back our bodies. Rape is about power, not sex, and now I hear that there are more assaults. Ladies, let's get our power back.

Labor leader Hu Dan slain after exposing corruption

By John Pomfret
The Washington Post

XIAN, China _ Four years ago, solemn-faced manager Hu Dan rode to the rescue of one of China's biggest cashmere companies. The Shaanxi Animal Byproducts Import and Export Corp. was losing $10 million annually, despite feeding a cashmere craze created by foreign retailers like Banana Republic and The Gap.

In the shabby confines of the firm's headquarters, where he had struggled up the corporate ladder, Hu plowed into the state-owned company's records. He fired two-thirds of the top 60 managers. He launched an internal inquiry into how the company could have both record sales and huge losses. During his first year, it posted a profit.

And because of Hu's success, those close to him believe, an intruder broke into his apartment Aug. 30 and stabbed him to death. From the moment he became general manager, Hu found himself in a battle with a band of Communist officials who, like those at state-owned enterprises nationwide, made millions by turning the company into their personal fiefdom, company sources said. Corrupt managers allegedly bought low-quality cashmere at inflated prices from private dealers, dumped the cashmere on the international market at low prices, then collected kickbacks from the dealers. The state-run firm ate the loss.

"The bad books of the company are rooted in the fact that the company is riddled with worms who are eating state assets and involved in shady deals with outsiders." Hu wrote in an analysis of the company. "They created a convoluted net of mutual relationships to steal state assets, and drink the enterprise's blood to fatten themselves. The level of corruption is enough to make your hair stand on end!"

Hu's crusade caused him to be kidnapped by government prosecutors. He lost a court case and a $480,000 judgment in a judicial order that one prominent newspaper called a perversion of Chinese law. He rarely came home the last two months of his life, running scared from constant death threats.

To Xiong, the story sums up the futility of trying to change China. In the 1950s, Hu's father, a correspondent during China's civil war, was purged in a Communist Party campaign and wasn't rehabilitated until 1980. Now, she says, his son has been killed by the same forces trying to hold China back.

"In this country, a clean official leads a hard life; a dirty official has an easy one," she said in an interview in the four-room apartment where she and her husband lived. "Even though they were all party members, what did the party give them? One political campaign after another, and now this? Is this what happens to patriots in China?"

At the end of his life, her husband was resolved to continue reforms, Xiong said. "He was tired and he was scared, but he wasn't going to give in."

The day he was killed, a steamy Monday, Hu Dan was on a rare visit home. He had stripped off his clothes to beat the heat when an intruder entered and stabbed Hu 19 times. The assailant slipped on Hu's suit, filched his mobile phone and a stack of cash from a dresser drawer, and left Hu to die.

Hu's death has gone unreported in Xian: The province's propaganda committee issued a ban on the story. Only one paper dared publish the news _ Southern Weekend, a sometimes crusading broadsheet from China's freewheeling south, nearly two months later.

The only thing that gives Xiong any consolation, she said, is the police. "They've been vigorous," she said. "But nobody is talking to them."

It's a silence Hu came to know in his own dealings with the judicial system. In a report about the court case involving the Hebei firm, he wrote: "This type of naked theft of state assets constitutes serious criminal behavior. We must not allow judicial corruption to become a tool to plunder state assets."

At the time, provincial authorities began investigating his charges but, arriving at the gates of the Hebei merchant, they found a sign with the signatures of various local government officials that said: "Investigation Forbidden."

Despite some encouraging signs, Haitians still endure suffering

By Mark Fineman
Los Angeles Times

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti _ More than five years and over $2 billion after President Clinton ordered 20,000 U.S. troops to occupy this Caribbean nation - first to "Restore" and then to "Uphold Democracy," as the U.S. operations were named - chaos and violent death remain facts of life in Haiti.

Disturbing signs of disintegration abound. Among them: drug lords who are attempting to take over key sectors of the nation's economy, vengeful rivals within senior police ranks, and political outlaws in a land that many seek to rule but few to govern.

In January, President Rene Preval dissolved Parliament and began ruling by fiat. Now political life is polarized, cynical and fraught with apathy in advance of national and local assembly elections scheduled for March.

Many here blame the political situation on a destabilization campaign by supporters of former President Jean-Bertrand Aristide meant to bring the onetime Roman Catholic priest back to power in a presidential election next fall - a charge Aristide's spokesman denied.

Despite such encouraging signs as an estimated 4.5 percent annual economic growth rate this year, most of Haiti's economy still appears in shambles, with analysts attributing at least some of that growth to profits from the tons of cocaine that transit Haiti en route to the United States.

And crimes committed by the nascent National Police force are disturbingly frequent, with scores of U.S. trained and recruited officers implicated in dozens of slayings, beatings and illegal drug transactions, while 20 other officers have been killed this year.

With the last few hundred U.S. humanitarian and security troops now preparing to pull out of bases in the capital by early next year, many here and in the United States believe that the intervention long billed as a major foreign policy victory for the administration may well be remembered as anything but.

"Things are going sour in Haiti," declared Rep. Porter J. Goss, R-Fla., before a House vote June 9 on his legislation to end the $22 million-a-year U.S. military commitment in the Caribbean nation. "We no longer have all the elements of democracy down there that we seek to have. The dictatorship has, in fact, returned."

In arguing against the amendment to end Operation Uphold Democracy, which passed 227-198 largely along party lines, Democrats insisted that Haiti remains a success story.

Most independent analysts agree that personal and political freedoms now far exceed those under the military dictatorship the U.S. intervention drove out. The intervention, Democrats said, reduced the number of Haitians illegally landing on U.S. shores from 60,000 during the three years of military dictatorship ending in 1994 to a few thousand a year now. The few hundred soldiers at a time who have rotated through the U.S. bases in the capital since Washington withdrew the bulk of its troops in 1996, Democrats note, have treated thousands of impoverished, sick and wounded Haitians, built roads, schools and bridges, and dug dozens of freshwater wells.

But with the legislation pending in the Senate, the administration is acting unilaterally, closing its bases in Port-au-Prince and stationing visiting reservists in the countryside instead. Further testimony to Haiti's dangerous, enduring disorder came last month with the slaying of Jean Lamy and its aftermath.

The international monitors and trainers who oversee the police force have attributed the few successes to Denize and Manuel, whom diplomats said earned reputations as politically independent professionals during their years on the job. Yet both men were targeted in street protests and graffiti by pro-Aristide groups over the past several months.

Police investigators say Manuel resigned on Oct. 7 and left for Guatemala two days later. On the evening before he left, Manuel met with Lamy, who was Denize's chief technical consultant. Lamy was rumored to be Manuel's successor, though several Haitians now deny that.

After the meeting, Lamy was watching a soccer match at his villa when he received a phone call and agreed to meet the caller immediately, according to Mario Andresol, the federal judicial police chief who is investigating the slaying.

"It must have been a very important person," Andresol said, "or he wouldn't have gone out that night."

Fifteen minutes later, Lamy was shot once in the forehead in his pick up truck, his 9-millimeter pistol still tucked under his belt with the safety on. Investigators believe Lamy knew his killer.

Andresol, who was himself targeted in an ambush during which five bullets were fired into his car a week after the killing, said he's trying to locate Manuel to interview him and to trace that last call. But phone records here are difficult to research, he said.

Smith's Dogma a surprising gem of mature religious satire

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

Dogma
Directed by Kevin Smith
With Linda Fiorentino, Matt Damon, Ben Affleck, Chris Rock, Alan Rickman, Salma Hayek, Jason Lee, Jason Meyes, and Kevin Smith

I owe him or hate him (and the lines are drawn fiercely), Kevin Smith has proven himself one of the most unique filmmakers to emerge in recent years. Clerks, his first film, has generated a rabid cult following and was hailed by many as the cure for Hollywood a no-budget movie that revolved solely around dialogue. Lack of a discernable plot notwithstanding it's hard not to find Smith's style of vulgar hilarity and pseudo-philosophy oddly refreshing. He followed Clerks with Mallrats, which was more of the same, but entertaining nonetheless; Smith has a knack for blending existential angst with Gen X culture and an adolescent sense of humor, and somehow managing to produce a cohesive, relevant vision. His next movie, Chasing Amy, demonstrated Smith's growing maturity and ability to tackle romance in a non-comedic light. He was refining his bubble-world of human interaction and producing characters of true substance, instead of poorly acted conduits for his often lengthy, cumbersome exchanges.

Chris Rock, Jason Mewes and Salma Hayek star in Kevin Smith's latest, soon to be cult-classic, Dogma.

Dogma is somewhat of a departure from his other movies (it was written before Clerks, but had to be shelved due to budget considerations), and abandons Smith's examination of twenty-something romance for a satirical world of angels, apostles, and prophets. Matt Damon and Ben Affleck play Loki and Bartleby, a pair of angels whom God has cast out of heaven. The angels have found a loophole in God's decree, which should allow them reentrance to Heaven. To successfully contradict the word of God, however, would be to disprove her infallibility, and if Loki and Bartleby go through with their plan, all of existence would undo itself. God dispatches the angel Metatron, played excellently by Alan Rickman, to enlist the aid of Bethany (Linda Fiorentino), a spiritually dead abortion clinic worker. Chris Rock as Rufus, the thirteenth apostle, Salma Hayek as the muse Serendipity, and Jason Lee as the demon Azrael complete Smith's who's-who of the afterlife.

And last but not least, no Kevin Smith movie would be complete without Jay (Jason Mewes) and Silent Bob (Smith himself). It would be easy to dismiss the characters as an unnecessary, distracting indulgence on Smith's part, but they help to dilute the potentially heavy-handed nature of film, keeping it well-grounded in actual characters but they make effective soapboxes for Smith's vision. For this reason, the particulars of the plot become blurry and unnecessary as we find the film's most meaningful moments during its many long character exchanges.

Dogma spends a lot of time taking stabs at Catholicism as an example of how worthwhile religious ideals can be lost in a sea of doctrine and petty church fragmentation. Before your religious blood-starts to boil, however, Smith should be given credit for his surprisingly mature treatment of the desire for religion and its usefulness within society. He takes issue with the misuse of religion within our culture, and the movie's primary message is one of a simplification of religion, and an abandonment of the unnecessary complication of so many Christian splinter churches. There are jokes of course, and the sort of inane crudeness you expect from Smith, but Dogma in no way supports atheism. It calls for a reexamination of the role religion should play in our lives, but his belief in its necessity is clear. B+

A proper farce presented in She Stoops to Conquer

By Kristi Ceccarossi
Collegian Staff

SHE STOOPS TO CONQUER
Directed by Ed Golden
Rand Theatre, November 13

I have to wonder why any company would choose to do a play with archaic language, hyperbolic characters, and a situational comedy that loses entertainment value outside of historical context. Especially in light of the more relative wealth that modern drama provides—it seems unfortunate that inaccessible, meaningless farces are opted for production. These outdated constructs fail to challenge actors and certainly don't test audiences' ideals. But, it is not for me to lament on the burning question, why did UMass' theatre department decide to do She Stoops to Conquer, of all plays—the important thing is what they did with it.

Picture Deerfield in the eighteenth century and you have the setting for the production. In a growing theatrical trend that rarely works as well as this one did, director Ed Golden adapted his design of the play, which is usually set in aristocratic England, to better suit contemporary American audiences. His decision was ultimately effective and accompanied by several other elements that clearly illustrated his understanding as a director.

The play opened, more at the fault of the outdated playwright than anyone else, with a monotonous exchange between Mr. and Mrs. Hardcastle (Daniel Popowich and Dee Waterman, respectively). Through their conversation the basic formula of each character is quickly revealed and the plot, though gradually unraveled, becomes predictable. Mr. And Mrs. Hardcastle have recently arranged for their recently educated daughter Kate to meet Marlow, her husband to be—a man who is reportedly the antithesis of Kate's lively, liberal attitude. Kate's younger brother, Tony, is a raucous youth whose passions include alcohol, women of questionable repute, and toying with other people's emotions. When Marlow, on his way to the Hardcastle's, gets lost and seeks directions in a tavern, Tony attacks the opportunity to spice things up and sends him to his family's home, but convinces him that he's going to an inn. So, everyone is mislead, identities are mistaken, and the comedy ensues.

As uninspiring as I found the script, it became easier to overlook as the play progressed. I give credit entirely to the cast for this. Regardless of the choices they made with their characters, every actor was consistent in their role, maintaining the level of performance that should be present in college theatre. Colin Metz as Marlow and Laura Lowry as Kate were exceptionally impressive in this regard. They both varied nicely in the dynamics of their respective roles and clearly knew something about comedic timing—especially Metz in the scenes where Marlow becomes frantic and dysfunctional in the presence of Kate. The length of the play and whatever gaps existed in other areas seemed to be cured by the agility and ease of these central actors.

The chief problem I have with a show like She Stoops to Conquer is the veil it can provide for less refined acting and real talent. The play lacks the richness of character we see in works of the twentieth century where real people deal with real issues. Instead, it's just a whimsical night of theatre with over-exaggerated, unrealistic families doing whacky things. With parts written like Mr. and Mrs. Hardcastle it becomes difficult to decide whether or not actors Waterman and Popowich might have been less presentational and obnoxious in their roles if they weren't written with that intended angle. I suspect in more favorable, taxing roles, both actors would fair well, but with the material they had to work with, it's impossible to tell. Also questionable was Andrew Whitehead as Tony Hardcastle. I can't discern where the blame for this lies, in the actor or director, but his Pauly Shore-esque interpretation of the wayward, but irresistible younger brother became grating by the end of the show. It would have been more tolerable if he could have kept still on stage for more than ten seconds; Whitehead seemed to be thinking less, and hamming it up more as the play progressed.

As a whole though, the play delivered the quality and energy one would hope to find from the University's department. The artistic design (particularly set and costumes) was outstanding, and the production was fluid and complete. The cast and crew were equally united and obviously led by a director with a clear, if not entirely preferable, vision. The production is certainly worth a few dollars and a night at the Fine Arts Center, even if it doesn't make you exercise your brain very much. She Stoops to Conquer is playing for two more weekends in the Rand Theatre. Tickets are still available by calling the Fine Arts box office at 545.2511.

Greetings – scrubs, pigeons and hater players. In the appropriate words of Naughty By Nature's Vin Rock, "once again, it's on!"

Yes indeedy, I have emerged to typographically shadowbox with culture and politics of urban sound and style. First time readers be warned: this column often contains material that is manifested in the subterranean; brewed and fermented amidst the organic elements of hip-hop, and journalistically spurned with the intention of uncaging the artists and aspects that receive minimal notoriety. So, a rap map of the pop charts this is not. However, since rap (or rap's influence) did in fact dominate Billboard music this summer, it seems fitting to begin by expounding upon the putrid subject of its saturated popularity.

This past July I was flipping through the radio when I landed on an interesting new station called Jammin' Oldies. Immediately I paused my surf of the frequency module air-waves, as I realized the song playing was "The Way We Were" by Gladys Knight and the Pips. Adjusting the volume upwards, I began to marginally sing along, "can it be that it was oh so simple..." The tune, of course was hooked by Wu-Tang in 1993 and as the words sunk in I was overcome by a feeling of sensational nostalgia. Regrettably, that prophetic phrase underlines a saddening denotation for hip-hop today.

At its core, the simplicity of rap's execution has been perhaps its most complex component. Yet, ever-increasingly, hip-hop is drifting away from this complexity and becoming more complicated, thugmatic and downright chaotic. The density of its substance (documented throughout last year) is continuously extracted as the culture becomes metaphorically similar to a pig on a roasting pit: While one side never sees the flames of the fire, the flip side is burned, overcooked and feasted upon by vultures. For evidence, check out the type of background dance attempted in Britney Spears videos. Or peep the aesthetic verbal discourse exemplified in the rhyming styles of rock/rap hybrid groups like Limp Bizkit, Korn, Kid Rock and Insane Clown Posse. Or, if you really have a thick constitution, listen to the way I.F.O. bites to replicate the reminiscent sing-song style of countless emcees in their hit "Summer Girls (Abercrombie & Fitch)." Synonymous to eating swine, digesting these larcenies of rap straight up makes me sick. And to make matters worse, the purists who thrive on the realism of unadulterated hip-hop are blatantly losing the battle. (See O-Tip's single "Vivrant.") The music industry, which is the driving force in commodifying and colonizing an urban dichotomy, is pumping out this commercial rap at alarming rates. (Once upon a time, Hot 97 was even filled with quality programming.) Thus, even more rigorously than a year ago, the hip-hop minded are slowly losing theirs.

So, as both an enthusiast and a journalist, it is my personal mission to bring forth the miniscule portions of the realism still left. I will scour the dustiest of record shops; search the most obscure websites and dig through depths of the mediated world. With Gladys Knight in mind, the goal is to find that complex simplicity that is missing. Stay tuned...

The Roots are keeping it real in a world where the rudiments of hip hop are getting lost in pop culture.

Panic is Widespread, and in town

By Caroline Fullmer
Collegian Correspondent

Widespread Panic is coming to town! Need I say more? Yes, I need to say more, because the show in Boston is not sold out, and this band is incredible, and in all honesty I'm a little disappointed! Hey UMass, Phish is not the only band out there – open your ears!

Widespread Panic is a band with incredible talents and an even more incredible following. With a sound straight from Athens, Ga., Widespread Panic has been touring for 15 years, resulting in 200 sold-out shows, seven great CD's, and a record-breaking CD release party, during which the streets of Athens were saturated with 100,000 spreadheads. Just recently Panic performed three sold-out shows during a Halloween run in New Orleans. So I ask again, why did I not hear anybody speaking of Widespread this weekend, why are their sweets tunes never heard out a window in Central, why is everybody already buzzing about Phish a whole month away, when you can get your fix, to groove at Widespread?

This band incorporates everything into their music, with a sound easy to recognize. Panic knows how to do it all, from The Allman Brother's style of cruisin' tunes, to hard core need to get up and move, Panic is downright addictive! Their latest CD, Till The Medicine Takes, is actually quite different from the previous ones, including the very popular Light Fuse and Get Away, which is a compulsion of their live music. However this CD is tighter, more lyric-laden and innovative than the others. What was that? Was that a little hip-hop scratching? John Bell, to the soothing sound of Michael Houser on lead guitar, Dave Schools' punchy bass line and the jazzy rhythm of 'Jojo' Herman on the keyboard, compliment Domingo "Sunny" Ortiz and Todd Nance's pounding beats on their huge percussion set-up to make music that is down right good! Not one song I need to skip past, each one has a distinct tune, and body-moving beat. I, for one, cannot wait to jam out to their music and show my appreciation for such creativity through dancing. It just kills me that here in New England where so much good music originates, a band like Widespread Panic is practically unheard of.

Widespread Panic, the lesser-known answer to jam band demands, finds their way to Boston's Orpheum Theatre this Wednesday night.

On recent trip to Vermont more than once I was questioned who Panic was. Where are all you spreadheads out there! Our beloved Phish is not the only band! Take a break from school—it's only an hour drive—and come check out this band! You will be amazed, come on UMass and New England jump on the bandwagon and join in some good music induced fun!

Widespread Panic is performing live at The Orpheum Theatre in Boston, on Wednesday, Nov. 17. Tickets are $22.50 and are available through Ticket Master (617) 931-2000. Show starts at 7:30pm.

Horoscopes

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – It's time for you to contribute to an important group effort today. You've been working independently for long enough.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Others are likely to notice a subtle change in your behavior today, and remark upon it, too, if given the chance.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Someone you hardly know is likely to put you in a position that will require an important choice on your part. You'll have little time, too.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – While others are coming and going at a frantic pace, you'll have the chance to settle into a businesslike routine and really get it right.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You may be mistaking something fleeting for something permanent today. It's time to make a change that will minimize disappointment.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You may become obsessed with one or two hidden dangers today. Don't neglect routine affairs, however, even while some things heat up in this way.

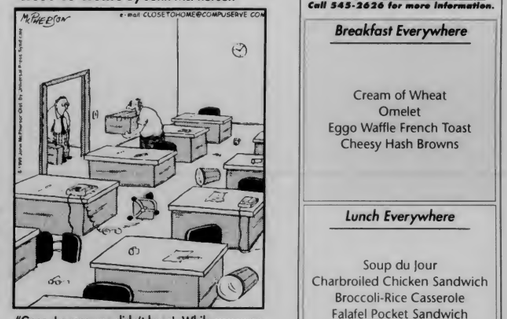
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You're not going to feel fully prepared today until you've gone over your task again and again, focusing on all the smallest details.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Concentrate on those issues, which are most pressing today. An intellectual approach may not be the most suitable. It is time to trust your instincts and common sense.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Dress the part today and you'll surely be taken more seriously and receive exactly what you feel you deserve. Looks and manners are everything.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Take care that you are not misunderstood today, even as you continue planning a special strategy with care. Don't make others defensive at this time.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You may get some distressing news today, but you won't have time to get overly indulgent in your reactions. Keep moving forward!



LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You'll find yourself in control during the first part of the day, but you'll have to work hard to keep someone from taking over for you later.

Parity the only sure thing in '99 pro pigskin

Forget putting your money where your mouth is. You're better off keeping your money in your pocket and your mouth shut when it comes to pro football this year.

This past weekend's gridiron action lent further proof to the theory that

Adam White
the NFL

parity is the only sure bet in the NFL this season.

Take the NFC East, for example. This once mighty division has been reduced to a study in mediocrity, with the three top dogs struggling just to keep their heads above water. The Giants appear to be the frontrunners, but how can a team that gives up more points per game (18.3) than it scores (17.4) possibly hope to contend for a playoff spot? Even after putting up decent numbers against the Colts this weekend (237 yards passing, 172 special teams yards) the Giants still found a way to lose, committing four turnovers and failing to record a single sack of Peyton Manning.

Then there are the Redskins. How on Earth do you outgun your opposition by 256 yards passing and still lose? Brad Johnson and company may have ruled the air on Sunday against the Eagles, but the Skins stunk up Veteran's Stadium to the tune of three interceptions and four fumbles. Add those to the 222 yards yielded by Washington on kick returns, and you have the perfect recipe for a crushing defeat.

The class of the division may be Dallas, which limped into its Sunday showdown with Green Bay a mere shadow of its former self. Jason Garrett against Brett Favre? Are you kidding? Actually, it was Dallas that did the majority of the laughing in this one, as the Cowboys' massive front three held Dorsey Levins and company to a scant 40 yards rushing and Lone Star d-backs George Teague and Kevin Smith each snagged interceptions in a shocking 27-13 Dallas upset.

The Black and Blue Division, the NFC Central, is just as perplexing. With the Pack playing sub-.500 football for the first time in recent memory, Detroit and Minnesota look destined to duke it out in the season's final weeks for all the Central marbles. The Lions have handed the reins to Washington castoff Gus Frerotte, who threw for 375 yards but was sacked five times in a 23-19 loss at Arizona Sunday.

The Vikings, meanwhile, have seemingly struck gold with the decision to let Jeff George run the offensive show. The journeyman QB found sensational sophomore Randy Moss 12 times for 204 yards Sunday at Soldier Field, and the "Purple People Eater II" forced three fumbles and sacked Chicago QB Jim Miller three times.

Way out in the NFC West, everyone is still wondering when the Rams are going to wake up and start playing like, well, the Rams. St. Louis may have pulled another big win (35-10 over Carolina) out of their... uh... helmets on Sunday, but the Rams were helped out by a hapless Panther team that yielded six sacks but failed to even get a finger on Kurt Warner.

Over in the AFC, the West is starting to look like the NFL's bizzaro division. The only box I that defending champion Denver will be seeing at the end of this season is the toilet, while the Seahawks' best receiver, Joey Galloway, has grabbed little more than headlines after holding out for the first two months of the season. That hasn't stopped Mike Holgrem's troops from rising to the top of the division, just ahead of Gunther Cunningham's rejuvenated Chiefs.

The AFC Central is hereby redubbed the NFL's All-Ugly division. Leader Jacksonville participated in one of the most hideous games in recent memory this weekend, outlasting Baltimore 6-3 in a game oddly reminiscent of the title fight at the end of Rocky II. Neither team could manage 100 yards on the ground, and Jacksonville's 132 yards of total offense spelled its worst output since it joined the league in 1995.

Despite playing in what are quite possibly the NFL's ugliest uniforms, Tennessee has played pretty football en route to a 7-2 record. Bruising runner Eddie George galloped all over the Bengals Sunday, to the tune of 125 yards on 29 attempts.

If any one division has given us quality pigskin action this year, it's the AFC East. Any of the top four teams (Indy, Miami, New England and the Patriots) could walk away with the crown, and the inter-division games thus far have been nothing short of spectacular. Buffalo proved it's for real Sunday by mauling Miami, 23-3, behind the power running of Antowain Smith (29 carries for 126 yards) and its most dominant defensive game of the season. The Dolphins managed only 101 yards of total offense, while the Bills sacked Miami QB Damon Huard three times.

Minutewomen ride weekend A-10 seesaw

Meyers shatters UMass kill record, but team must settle for split

By Seth Szilagyi & James Piehl
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts volleyball team split conference matches this weekend, as they swept LaSalle, but fell 1-3 to top-ranked Temple.

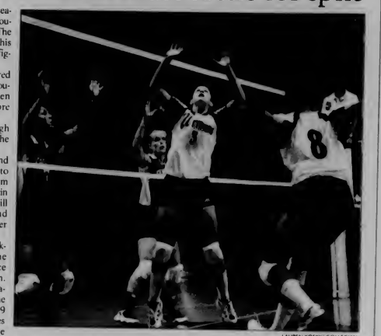
The weekend started versus the Explorers in Philadelphia with senior Jill Meyers becoming UMass' all-time kill leader in the victory. The Minutewomen swept a weaker LaSalle squad, 15-8, 15-3, and 15-8. Meyers led the way, amassing a double-double with 18 kills and 12 digs. Meyers finished the night smacking a .615 and replaced previous kill leader Dionne Nash with 1,687 kills.

Senior Kari Hogancamp chipped in with a team-high 18 digs and was one kill shy of a double-double herself with 9 kills. Junior Rebecca Hasson continued to shine, collecting 12 kills and 4 blocks to take over fourth on Massachusetts' all-time block list. Freshman Jennifer Davis came off the bench with a career night, posting 12 digs along with 4 kills.

Sophomore setter Heather Holtsberg was in a giving mood, dishing out 39 assists to pass junior teammate Jennifer Drennan for third on UM's all-time assist list, tallying 1,868 career assists.

With the win, the Minutewomen improved to 9-6 in the Atlantic 10 and 15-11 overall. The feeble Explorers remained in the doldrums of the A-10 conference, falling to 2-12 in the A-10 and 15-16 overall.

Friday's events were bittersweet, however, as the Minutewomen couldn't handle the conference leading Owls and fell 15-8, 4-15, 8-15, 11-15. The dominating Owls upped their record to 12-2 in the conference and 19-5 overall.



Meyers continued to finish up her strong senior season with fury, as she led her team with another double-double, tallying 21 kills, 15 digs, and 5 blocks. The senior co-captain again surpassed Dionne Nash, this time for first on UM's list for matches with double-figure kills at 90.

Co-captain counterpart Hogancamp again registered a team-high in digs with 19, while just missing a double-double again with 9 kills. Sophomore Janeen DeMarte added 18 digs and 9 kills, as sophomore Lymarie Llovet recorded a team-high 9 blocks.

Holtsberg continued her generosity through Saturday, tossing assists to her team like candy. She registered 43 assists, out of the team's 48.

With the season winding down, the Maroon and White seniors Meyers and Hogancamp continue to dominate opponents. Meyers remains tops on the team in kills with 4.43 per game, while staying second in digs with 3.37 per game. Hogancamp, meanwhile, still owns the country in digs with 5.22 per game, and remains second on the team in kills with 4.33 per game.

UM looks to finish up its regular season this weekend at home in the Curry Hicks Cage. The Minutewomen have their sights set on conference opponents Virginia Tech and George Washington. UMass is looking towards the A-10 conference tournament, but the light of playoff hope is dimming. The team will need to run the table over the rest of its '99 slate, and will need some help from its conference foes as well. With two wins this weekend, the Minutewomen want to see Dayton fall to Xavier and George Washington lose to second place Rhode Island. In UM's favor, that is a very plausible scenario.

Lax Lewis enough for title

By William Gildea
The Washington Post

LAS VEGAS – The second time around Saturday night, Lennox Lewis failed to dominate Evander Holyfield as in their controversial draw eight months ago in New York. Yet this time Lewis won the decision, making him undisputed heavyweight champion.

A respected trio of judges appointed by the Nevada Athletic Commission voted unanimously for Lewis over Holyfield, who fought better than he did in March, establishing the British fighter as the first unified heavyweight titleholder since Riddick Bowe in 1992.

An outburst of boos from the crowd of 18,000 at UNLV's Thomas & Mack Center greeted the announcement of the scores in the 12-round title unification rematch. Bill Graham scored it 117-111, Chuck Giampa had it 116-112 and Jerry Roth 115-113.

The scores brought cheers from several thousand Lewis fans from Britain, who had been relatively quiet the last half of the fight with the outcome in doubt. Through seven rounds, all three judges scored the fight 67-66 for Lewis, who increased his margin on all cards over the last five rounds. Graham awarded the last five to Lewis, while Giampa gave Lewis four of the last five and Roth three of the last five.

Holyfield, who at 37 gave away three years plus 25 pounds and 6 1/2 inches in reach, took the defeat stoically.

"I did everything I could," he said. "But when things fall into the judges' hands, anything can happen. I'm not happy with it, but I have to live with it." Declining to say whether he will continue fighting as his record slipped to 36-4-1, Holyfield added: "Victory to me means doing my very best, and I was able to do that tonight."

"This time it was more difficult," Lewis (35-1-1) said. "You go through the first fight and you win it, but you don't get the decision. Basically, it's been 10 years I've been trying to be undisputed heavyweight champion of the world. I finally did it and I'm bringing all the belt: back home."

But is he? In a bizarre turn of events, an official with the International Boxing Federation, one of the three major sanctioning bodies, reportedly left the arena with the IBF belt. Lewis' representatives had delayed in paying the $300,000 sanctioning fee to the organization, whose president and three other top officials were indicted Nov. 4, accused of accepting bribes from promoters and managers for favorable rankings for their boxers. But at 5 p.m. Saturday, according to Pat English, a lawyer representing Lewis, an agreement was reached with IBF official Walter Stone to place the money in escrow.

English said that just before the bout Stone, citing "a higher authority," said he could not make an agreement after all. Holyfield, who had been titleholder in the view of both the World Boxing Association and the IBF, entered the ring with only the WBA belt. Lewis came in with two. In addition to the World Boxing Council belt which he had held, he carried along the belt of a lesser-sanctioning group, the International Boxing Organization.

After the fight, English contended that the beleaguered IBF had been operating in a for-profit status – unlike the WBA and WBC – but "within the last week" revived its lapsed status as a non-profit organization.

"Technically, that makes two IBFs," English said. "We wanted to put the money in escrow until the situation with the IBF was straightened out."

No IBF official could be reached for comment Saturday night or Sunday. Promoter Don King, who handled Holyfield, shouted derision at Lewis' representatives. "You didn't pay the sanctioning fee," King said. But English outtalked even King, concluding by saying that Lewis was the undisputed champion "and that nothing Don King or I say" should mar the evening. King then hailed Lewis as the undisputed champion.

What was dissatisfying about the fight was Lewis' passive approach against an older and smaller opponent. Nor did Lewis take the fight to Holyfield as he had said he would. Often, Lewis' punches were not crisp and for the most part his jab lacked the sting of Holyfield's. Punch statistics, however, favored Lewis significantly. He was credited with landing 119 of 259 power punches compared with Holyfield's 85 of 254. Lewis connected on 76 of 231 jabs, Holyfield 52 of 162.

But the numbers suggest something less than a definitive way of judging a bout. If Lewis truly had landed 119 power punches, it would have been unlikely that Holyfield could have finished the fight. In addition, many blows that Lewis appeared to land were blocked by Holyfield's forearms and gloves.

"Lennox used his jab effectively early in the fight and his physical power was the difference late in the fight," said Emanuel Steward, Lewis' trainer.

That is how the three judges saw the fight as well. Holyfield had his moments. He stayed at long range most of the time, darting inside to throw punches, then dropping back to a safe range. His movement, especially in the first half of the fight, kept Lewis off balance, missing frequently and sometimes looking awkward.

A cut was opened alongside Lewis' right eye when the fighters' heads banged in the fifth round, but the wound was small and never posed a threat. The last minute of the ninth round was the high point for action, with both fighters landing heavily. But those 60 seconds took a lot out of Holyfield. He had virtually nothing left in rounds 10 and 11. He rallied gamely in the 12th, but Roth was the only judge to score the round for him.

Champion Pak ready to celebrate

By Thomas Bonk
Los Angeles Times

LAS VEGAS – So here are Se Ri Pak's off-season plans:

"Party all night, sleep all day, non-stop eating," she said.

Yes, the debate ends here. ... Winning is a good thing.

There's nothing like being a 22-year-old superstar who has eight victories in only two years and enough money to party, sleep and eat all she wants.

After a one-hole playoff Sunday lasted just long enough for Pak to stick a three-foot birdie putt in the bottom of the 18th hole, win the PageNet Tour Championship and collect $215,000.

Why, it was enough to get some really good feelings about this place, Pak said.

"Just exciting," she said. "Fun city. Fun golf course. Fun tournament. Playoff. It's exciting. Everything pretty much fun for me this week. Just happy."

Of course, you can see her point. Pak managed to get past Karri Webb and Laura Davies in the playoff after all three tied for the lead at 12-under 276. As close as they were on the scoreboard, Pak set herself apart with an uncannily accurate eight-iron to the green from 138 yards out, the ball coming to a stop only a few paces above and to the right of the hole.

All she had to do to win was make that putt, since Davies 25-foot chip shot from just off the green stopped rolling only an inch from the hole. The best she could do was tap in for par.

"I don't see how I missed," Davies said.

Then it was Webb's turn. Her 20-footer for birdie slid past the hole on the right by a foot.

Webb thought Pak could make the putt even if she used a bunker rake.

"She would have had to hit a pretty bad putt to miss it," Webb said.

Standing next to Webb by the side of the green, Davies folded her arms across her chest and waited for the inevitable. There was no question that Pak would make her putt, she said.

"Absolutely," said Davies, who is now 1-8 in playoffs but believes she knows why.

"I keep losing," she said.

Meanwhile, Pak keeps on winning. Her fourth LPGA tournament victory of the year moved her past Annika Sorenstam into third place on the money list with $956,926.

Pak's eight tournament victories are starting to take on a certain look. In six of them, she was either the leader or tied for the lead after three rounds. It's the look of a closer.

Webb said she is becoming accustomed to it, which is what happens when you're the runner-up in three of Pak's four victories this year, as Webb has been.

"She's got my number right now," Webb said.

As a consolation, Webb wound up hitting a triple. She finished the greatest year of her four-year career by winning the money title, $1,591,959, winning the player of the year award and winning the Vare Trophy for the lowest scoring average.

In fact, Webb's 69.43 is the lowest in LPGA history, breaking Annika Sorenstam's year-old record of 69.99, the first sub-70 average. "It's definitely been a year to remember," Webb said. "You never know how many of these years will come by. Maybe there will be only one. Maybe not."

The only player who had a chance to upend Webb in the money race and for player of the year was Juli Inkster, who needed to win on Sunday for any chance. But Inkster seemed to tire, especially on the back, where she was 2-over and finished with a 74 for sixth place.

Webb won six times, Inkster won five. Webb won one major, Inkster won two.

"Juli and I really deserve to win it together," she said. "It's hard to say this year that one person was player of the year. I think there are two."

Sky diver dies after accident

By Shav Glick

POMONA, Calif. – Lawrence Yohn, 59, a professional sky diver from Perris, died in a frightening accident as an estimated 40,000 spectators looked on during the opening ceremony of the Auto Club NHRA drag racing finals Sunday at Pomona Fairplex.

Yohn was one of four divers from the Aztec Sky Diving Team who were to land on the drag strip a few minutes before the first race was scheduled. As Yohn was descending, a gust of wind seemed to catch him and slammed him into a track guardrail. After hitting the wall, Yohn flipped over onto the right lane of the strip, about 40 yards from the starting line.

The crowd let out a collective gasp as he hit. Two other divers landed without incident, and a fourth came in fast and was stunned before getting up.

"I think he was dead when he hit the track," one onlooker said. "He never moved, and when the ambulance left, neither the lights nor the siren were on."

Yohn, an instructor at the Perris Airport Sport Parachute Center, was transported to the Pomona Valley Medical Center, where attempts to revive him were unsuccessful. He was pronounced dead at approximately 11:30 a.m., about 35 minutes after the accident, according to a hospital spokesperson.

He was not married and had no children.

Yohn had logged more than 2,500 jumps during his career, team members said.

As soon as the ambulance departed, the track was prepared for the first run between Scott Kalitta and Don Lampus and the day's program went on as scheduled.

Fourth assault stuns already nervous campus

Attack rocks rallying students

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

Yesterday, while students were rallying against two previous reports of sexual assault and one reported physical assault, a fourth student reported an assault on campus. For two consecutive Tuesdays, students have reported being attacked near the Campus Center Pond. A student also reported an attack that occurred Sunday evening near the pond.

UMass does not release the names of victims.

On Tuesday, Nov. 2, a student reported a sexual assault near the campus pond at 6 p.m. On Tuesday, Nov. 9, a student was reportedly sexually assaulted in the bushes near the Metawampee Lawn. On Sunday, Nov. 14, three students reportedly pepper-sprayed a woman and started punching her. She freed herself and fled the scene.

Yesterday's attack occurred in Lot 63 beside Skinner Hall, about a quarter-mile from where the students were protesting.

John Luippold, the chief of the University of Massachusetts Police Department, held a press conference at 3:55 p.m. yesterday afternoon.

According to Luippold, an individual affiliated with the University reported at 1:55 p.m. that she had been assaulted in Lot 63. The individual who assaulted her was described as a white male wearing a baseball cap, between five-foot-nine and six-feet tall with a medium build. The assailants from the other two attacks have been described as standing six to six-foot-three inches tall with medium to muscular builds.

"This is another incident in the context of the other assaults that are under investigation," Luippold said. He said that the assault was being considered as only a physical assault. The other two Tuesday assaults were reportedly of a sexual nature.

The assailant reportedly attacked the individual with a knife, which was later recovered underneath an adjacent vehicle after police investigation. It was the second assault that involved a weapon. The student assaulted Sunday was sprayed with pepper spray. The victim of yesterday's attack was taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital where she was being treated for facial lacerations. Luippold said that while the investigation was not specifically focusing on the relationships among the assaults, the possibility was not being discounted.

"We can't exclude that this may be the same person," Luippold said. He added that while the attacker may be the same in all cases, he wasn't attacking individuals with any specific characteristics, as in hair color or physical build. He did say that the descriptions of the individuals involved in Sunday's attack were somewhat different than that of the assailants in the Tuesday assaults.

UMPD is continuing to investigate the assaults, with the Amherst Police Department assisting. State police have also been called in for assistance.

Luippold also answered questions yesterday about the safety of the campus. He recommended that parents keep in touch with their children on a regular basis.

He also mentioned that any student in need of a ride or an escort will be provided one.

"Students need to get away from situations that do not seem right to them," Luippold said. "We stress that students need to take advantage of services offered to them."

Barbara O'Connor, the UPMD deputy chief of police, said that beyond the University services being offered, additional police and security forces have been added to the campus.

It's going to get out of control," Chris David, senior mathematics major, said. "It's creeps walking when you know there's a rapist out there. You think that you should feel safe at school, but it's not safe here."

Most students said they were not only scared, but confused by the incidents of the past two weeks. They said they can't comprehend how these attacks can be occurring on campus, especially in broad daylight.

"I'm dumbfounded. I can't believe that it's going on, and that someone is getting away with it in the middle of the day," Ryan Connolly, senior history and sociology major, said. "I've been here for four years and I've never seen anything like this before – nothing so open."

"I'm mostly surprised. It makes me angry that this happens on campus," Frank DiMeglio, a junior civil engineering major, said. "But for the most part, I'm surprised about the time of day that it happened."

Despite a seemingly overwhelming feeling of fear, many students expressed that they were angry.

"I'm just angry about being scared. I've never used the Women across the University of Massachusetts campus are thinking, many for the first time, that it may be unsafe for them to walk alone on campus, unsafe to complete their everyday activities. Similarly, men are concerned with what's been happening and questioning the safety of the campus.

"I used to walk around alone on campus and I can't now. I won't now. I don't feel comfortable," Linda Pierce, a graduate student in English, said. "It seems like a safe campus, but we [women] can't walk around at night. We should have that right."

Students are raising emotional questions as attacks continue to be reported.

"When can women feel safe? I've had to change my whole way of being for the past two weeks because of this," Tanya Panin, a communications major, said. "I used to feel safe and now I don't."

"I feel like it should be a wake-up call for the police.

Women's center councils students on campus safety

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The Everywoman's Center is working to make the University of Massachusetts a safer place following the fourth assault on campus.

According to Meher Singh, a counselor/advocate for the Everywoman's Center, the organization has been working with groups on campus to educate students about the effects of violent crimes.

Currently the organization has been working with the UMass Police Department and the Student Government Association on safety measures to prevent violent crimes on campus. The collaboration of groups has passed out whistles to women on campus and also hopes to eventually distribute "shriek" alarms to campus students. With a shriek alarm, if a student is being attacked he or she could throw the alarm on the ground, at which point it would go off, making a loud "shrieking" sound.

In addition, the group has also helped to host two rape awareness vigils on campus providing a forum for students to voice their feelings the recent incidents. Both vigils were held in conjunction with the Men's Resource Project and the Mount Holyoke Women's organization.

"This is really a community effort," Singh said.

Singh explained that the Everywoman's Center also has a functioning Counselor/Advocate Program. This program provides women that have been victims of sexual assault and domestic violence, with a 24-hour hotline in order to talk about issues of concern. Women can call regarding both issues that have happened recently and to talk about past issues that occurred.

The hotline serves all of Hampshire County and is monitored by more than 20 counselor/advocates.

"We respond to calls all over the country as well as here [UMass]," Singh said.

Students gathered yesterday outside the Student Union to protest, rally and to honor survivors of sexual assaults and violence, but less than a quarter of a mile, the reality struck home as the University of Massachusetts was hit by another random attack.

Moments before candles were lit, shrieks were heard across the crowd as those present realized that the violence had not stopped. Women and men alike spoke throughout the vigil on their fear and pain. Individuals opened up their hearts to share with the few hundred in attendance their stories. Although tears filled their eyes, the group continued on, lighting each candle in attempt to join together and support one another. Lyrics of "Amazing Grace" and "Lean on Me" could be heard among the crowd.

Organizations represented at the rally included the Everywoman's Center, the Men's Resource Center and the a cappella group Meanwhile. Each spoke on how their group has been affected by the recent incidents, stressing the idea that rape needs to be recognized as violence.

Some groups paid special attention to men on campus.

"Think about the joking around daily that you do to undermine woman," Tom Gardener, manager/director of Media Education Foundation, said.

These organizations also included The Men's Resource Center that said it wants men to challenge other men in regards to violence. Representatives also questioned the crowd and men in particular asking, "Why is it that women educate men about rape and not men educating men?"

"We need to be challenging men and challenging ourselves," Mark Ribble of the Men's Resource Center in Amherst said.

In addition to those concerned groups, Chancellor David K. Scott addressed the audience.

"In the next minute I speak to you, 10 women will have been beaten and four will have been raped all over the world," Scott said. "We have to take the campus back and make it safer once again."

Scott informed students that the University is increasing security inside residence halls as well as around the area of the campus pond. Plans for increased security include a new HELP call box to be installed by the pond and a new light to be set up near the Student Union building.

Students applauded when Scott said the University will make a mechanism called a "shriek" alarm, which would create a loud noise when thrown against the ground, available to every student. Scott said these alarms would act as a distress signal, distracting or warding off possible attackers.

In addition, the Escort Service has increased its service around its scheduled route and is offering walking escorts or personal vehicle escorts from 5 p.m. to 3 a.m., according to a public safety document.

Still, Scott indicated that the most proactive approach students can take is not to walk in poorly lit or isolated areas, but he also reminded students that even with these precautions, a woman is assaulted every 15 seconds throughout this country.

But, according to a counselor/advocate at the Everywoman's Center, rapes are one of the most unreported crimes on campus.

Representatives from the Student Government Association (SGA) responded by saying the administration has been negligent in addressing many of the safety concerns on campus, including installing lighting and cutting away shrubbery.

SGA President Jeff Howe said he is upset because the administration has been withholding information about these assaults.

"I asked why that wasn't published so students on our campus could provide safety for themselves, walk through the Campus Center or not come to campus at all," Howe said. "I put the responsibility on the administration for not putting the word out."

Howe said the administration indicated that the original event was isolated, but it that it took nearly three incidents for the administration to respond to the safety concerns. He said on the Oct. 12 Safety Walk, the Physical Plant was advised to cut back shrubbery and install a help box near the campus pond, but it has taken the Plant more than a month to take action.

"It took three people on this campus to be victimized before anything was done," Howe said. "We need to put pressure on the people of this administration so that another person isn't victimized and so that we don't come back to this [rally]."

Student Trustee Seth Avakian said that the trail leading from Orchard Hill to Sylvan residential area is referred to as the "rape trail." He said students should be disgusted that a part of campus is so unsafe.

Scott endorsed the suggestions for the next few weeks for students to express their support and to offer walks across campus in groups. He said this week he and Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Jesse Cevallos will be walking around the Student Union area as symbol of bringing back to the campus a sense of what has been lost.

"It's not clearly a woman's issue, but it is something we all need to work together on," Scott said. "We need to show somehow symbolically that we care."

As a closure to the vigil, students each took a flower and placed it at the edge of the pond as a way to "represent bonds of action and connection." The organizers of the vigil asked that every one come together, acknowledge what has happened and work to end the violence.

escort service before tonight," Lindsay Hanrick, a freshman, said. "I never thought about anything like this, except for date rape, before. It's just affecting so many things; we can't even deliver at the Sylvan snack bar now."

"It alters your lifestyle, even going to the bathroom, you always have to look twice," Sheri Olivet, junior sociology major, said. "You have to be afraid 24-7, when you're just suppose to be going to class."

The incidents have also brought more awareness to campus on the issue of rape and more students are being cautious in an attempt to protect themselves by utilizing services such as the Escort Service, and finding friends to walk with.

"Everyone is really aware. My friend is passing out whistles," Maira Fay, a pre-med senior, said. "I was never too worried before. I thought the call boxes and security were enough, but now...I mean one of the incidents happened in the middle of the afternoon. Long-term action needs to be taken."

Others feel this awareness is good.

"Security needs to be around-the-clock to protect the students," Celeste Tramor, a junior biology major, said. "I don't feel any less safe – you always have to be aware. Just because it's not publicized doesn't mean it's not happening.

"I think if anything, you almost feel safer that everyone is becoming aware. It's good to know it's not being swept under the rug."

Counselor/Advocacy program also offers short-term counseling with a counselor/advocate for 10-12 weeks. They also provide the option for support groups in the areas of rape and child sexual assault.

For the time being, Singh suggested some things students can do to protect themselves. Singh recommended students use both the Escort service and the walking service if they have to travel on campus. She also advised that students travel in groups, and be aware of their surroundings. She illustrated that students need to "use the services that are provided."

Currently, the Everywoman's Center is located in Wilder Hall on the UMass campus, and is available to address any student issues and concerns.

"Right now we are responding to a lot of calls from concerned people," Singh said.

The Everywoman's Center rape hotline can be reached at 545-0800. The Everywoman's Center Educator/Advocate program also offers on rape awareness, sexual violence on college campuses, violence against women and safety strategies for women. For more information call 545-0883.

SGA sets up PondWatch to increase student safety at UM

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

In addition to the $500 reward that the Student Government Association (SGA) is offering for any information leading to the arrest and conviction of the individual or individuals responsible for the recent assaults, the SGA is currently working to make students feel safer and more aware on campus. The reward money being offered has increased to $1,500, as 100.9 WRNX Radio, and University Productions and Concerts have each matched the original $500.

"The student government is doing everything in its power to make students aware, and take appropriate safety measures," Trustee Seth Avakian said. "I am shocked and disgusted at the actions of the vile individuals. The attack yesterday was obviously a response to the community coming together, but the community has to stay strong and not let these people take our campus from us."

Volunteers are coming together today to begin a program, PondWatch, where an organized group of students will patrol the area around the center of campus. The SGA has given $749 from Finance Reserves to help in the purchases of orange armbands, flashlights, and possibly walkie-talkies. Groups of volunteer students, always including at least one woman, will walk other students to and from classes.

There will also be Rape Aggression Defensive classes held next week, on Nov. 21, 22, and 23 in the Campus Center from 7 to 11 p.m. The classes are meant to provide educational information and strategies for preventing rape, according to Eleanor Geronne, attorney general of the SGA. The SGA has assisted in helping fund the additional classes and can be contacted for more information or to sign up.

Child care program, facility revamped

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Child Care Program has undergone many changes this semester.

According to Neil Brigham, the Assistant Director for the Child Care Program, the service has expanded its services by adding a new modular classroom building, and starting a new flexible-schedule childcare classroom for toddlers and preschool aged children. He explained that these new classrooms were "in addition to the programming that we already have going."

This modular building was designed to house the program's three existing toddler classrooms. The new 3,000 square-foot modular equips each of its three classrooms with its own bathroom for the children, a waiting area, an office and conference area and a pantry for food storage.

Brigham explained the new expansion came about due to interest from graduate students for a new type of childcare. He explained that parents within the program were looking for both affordability and flexibility. He said the new services within the program were "geared towards student families."

These flexible-schedule classrooms are to be used primarily by low-income families with part-time childcare needs on campus. Parents can also create a schedule around a variety of drop-off and pick-up times.

In addition to the service expansion, the UMass Child Care program has also received accreditation from the National Association for the Education of Young Children (NAEYC). According to Brigham, University Child Care is among about seven percent of early childhood programs nation-wide to receive accreditation out of the 12,000 programs that are still currently seeking it.

The process for accreditation is in-depth and involves many elements. Brigham explained that first the members of the program go through an intense self-study to see that they meet the criteria of the association. Next, the program sends out a survey to the parents of the students in the program to evaluate both the strengths and weaknesses of the program. The process also includes an on-site visit of the child-care facility to do an evaluation to see that all of the criteria are being met. The evaluator then sends the report to a group of national experts in order to determine whether or not the group deserves accreditation.

The greatest emphasis for accreditation by the NAEYC is placed upon the experiences of the child. The program considers the aspects of health and safety, staffing, staff qualifications and the physical environment. Emphasis is placed upon the children's relationships with the staff and how the program helps children to grow and learn.

The University Child Care program provides full day child-care for children ages 15 months to five years. The program is located on campus and is available to both UMass undergraduate and graduate students.

Escort Services 545-2123

Personal Safety Tips

- Use the Safety Escort Service. The department of Public Safety offers an Escort Service from 8 p.m. to 3 a.m. seven days a week on a fixed route basis. Schedules are available from the Dean of Students Office, Campus Center Information Booth, or by calling 545-2123. People should also use available public transportation provided by the PVTA.
- There is Safety in Numbers. Walk with a friend. Join up with other people as you travel.
- Report Suspicious Persons. People acting in ways that are not typical for the time and place. People who fit descriptions disseminated in previous Public Safety Alerts. People who alarm you even if you have no obvious reason for alarm ("go with your gut feelings"). All should be reported to the police to be checked out by calling 545-2121. If it is an emergency, call 911. To report other information, call the TIPS line, 577-TIPS (8477).
- Use HELP Phones (Blue Light) for Immediate Contact with Police. HELP phones are distributed around campus for you to contact the police. You can use the touch-tone pad as well as the immediate contact feature.
- For General Information and Referrals contact:

Take back the campus

The biggest issues right now at UMass, and possibly in the town of Amherst, are rape and assault. As you all are aware, there have been two sexual assaults on the UMass campus. One occurred at the campus pond in the early evening, and one occurred near the Student Union in the middle of the day. Both of the assaults occurred on Tuesdays. After the second assault, the campus was almost deserted by students. I know. I was walking around. Police and campus security were the only people all over the place.

What scares me about this is that there is a perpetrator in Amherst, and we're all running from the situation. Everyone should be careful, but staying in your room all day and night is not the answer. Running around like all hell has broken loose is also not the answer. We can deal with this. Extra care and safety are definitely necessary, but I honestly think that by hiding, we are telling the perpetrator that he is getting away with this. He is probably laughing at this situation, and all of us.

It's like we're the sheep and he's the shepherd. We're running around afraid of him. I'm not saying that the sheep should jump up against the shepherd and kick his ass, but I am saying that we should, instead of running, take back the night and take back the day. We need to take this campus back. Running doesn't get the job done. It might get you out of trouble temporarily, but you'll always be running from someone. We need to step up to the perpetrator and do something about it.

Emily Vacanti

This is my take on the recent events surrounding the assaults. Please forgive me if I sound like the Profiler (a television show on Saturday nights at, I think, 10:00 p.m.). Someone commits an assault by the campus pond in the early evening on a Tuesday. By that time the pond is all but deserted, so it's the perfect spot for an attack without being hidden. The time being 5:30 p.m. shows that he is seeing if he can get away with it before night has completely fallen.

Exactly one week later, another assault is committed. Maybe it's the same guy; maybe he's a copycat. We don't know. This time he is mocking security, the police, and all of UMass. He commits this assault near the Student Union in the middle of the day. Next, maybe he travels to another college in the five-college area: Amherst College. He has perhaps noticed the increased security at UMass. So he takes a detour. Now, this detour could very well go through all of the colleges in the five-college area in the future, perhaps alternating with stops back at UMass.

Maybe no more assaults will occur. But I can bet that now he has us where he wants us, and he's going to keep playing us until he is no longer entertained. He knows what he is doing and is anticipating our next move before we make it. What can I say? He's psychotic and sick.

This man, if you can call him that, is getting away with the world's most heinous crime, and now he's planning the next one. Since the incident at Amherst College occurred on a Thursday, he may be planning (just a hypothesis) to keep Amherst College in terror later in the week, and UMass in terror on Tuesdays. Maybe later this week he'll strike another college. Who knows?

As I said before, we have to take a stand against this guy. Some of my friends are actually not at all afraid of him, or of being assaulted. But they know that I think they're in denial. A lot of people I know, including myself, say that if any of us come in contact with this guy, we'll fight him and beat him up. We'll turn him in and make sure that he has no parole.

Unfortunately this is all said in heated discussion. We all know, or at least I know, that not one of my female friends could beat him up. One assault occurred in broad daylight. There's no way that I, or any of my female friends (as well as some of my male friends), could take this guy. I'm a green belt in karate and have taken a self-defense class. I know that I still couldn't do it. We need to be aware of our surroundings, and not let this situation control our lives. This campus belongs to the students, not to attackers who hide in the bushes and attack women.

The tangled web

Yeah, so now I have a webpage. My friend, we'll call him Wendall, suggested that I needed one, and although what I really needed was a hole in my head, I decided to go with the webpage. After all, websites are the trendiest things out there.

Companies hire people to design their websites, and Wendall has devoted many hours to perfecting his website-making skills in an effort to make himself more marketable. I don't want to hurt his feelings, but it seems to me that websites don't really exist. "Site" implies location, but unlike a physical place, my website isn't there if nobody is looking at it. I always see a web address (which I don't even know), but if nobody is looking at it, where does it go? And if all the computers in the world are shut off, is the Internet still there?

Alexis Pushkar

These are just some of the philosophical questions that grip our time, although nobody seems to be asking them except me. Everybody else seems to be moving right along, designing websites, selling Internet ads, using search engines, and looking at porn. For those who use the Internet, the expansion of information available inside your home, dorm room, or office is simply amazing, but in my opinion sifting through all that information is a royal pain in the neck.

For example, I wanted information on the Graduate Record Exams, known to everyone as the GREs. I went to the website, www.askjeeves.com, because it has been heavily advertised on television, and I allowed myself to be sucked into the ad campaign. Who doesn't want a British butler "butlering" around their dorm room?

I typed in "Where can I find more information on the GREs?" As a response, the server provided a list of related questions with "Ask" buttons next to them that I was supposed to click to find out more information. The list included: "where can I find information about the fashion designer Germaine Emilie Krebs (Gres)," "where can I view collections by the Hackensack River. But you must never grow complacent when in debt. The scoundrels will ambush you when you least expect it. Just look what happened to Han Solo in Cloud City.

"where can I get free criminal records," "where can I learn more about haute couture," "information on printing: offset lithography, digital printing," "order it for my car – Popular Mechanics – Automotive Repair," and "GRES about us." There was nothing about exams.

Not only were the provided questions useless, they were completely arbitrary. Free criminal records? Offset lithography? Popular Mechanics?

I refined my search and typed in "Where can I find information on the Graduate Record Exams?" This question stimulated the correct information, but only after the website presented links to websites on depression testing, diabetes testing, a music website, and information on the GED. Included in the list of links was a site on drama training and the British Theater. Why? Who the hell knows?

Even if I can get a search engine to stick to the topic that I asked about, the site will most likely tell me that there are 10,435 possible matches, and then I'll have to decide if they are worth sorting through. If I do decide to start examining websites, two problems arise. One, I have to worry about the source of the information. Many websites are unregulated in terms of content. Judgment on the merit of a source is completely in the court of those who find the site. Two, a web search can lead me astray from my original intentions by providing so many links that eventually I end up 50 websites away from where I started. I start out researching arthritis, and I end up reading about the mating patterns of pirates.

Because there is so much information out there and so many links crisscrossing in all sorts of crazy directions, no overarching power could keep up with the content and check the quality. Although many professors allow web sources to be used for projects and papers, I can understand the reasons why some do not. Poor webpages could lead to errors in students' work that might have been avoided if students had used more reputable sources. I have visited many webpages that must have been hastily written evident by the number of grammatical errors and spelling mistakes in the text. I am left to wonder if these people are qualified to disseminate any information at all.

Accurate or not, websites are the next democratic revolution. Anyone can put pretty much whatever he or she wants on the Internet, from the highest literary poetry, to the most useful information on monkeys, from all the college applications one could ever want, to all sorts of useless garbage about practically anything. Because websites are free, anyone can have one, whether or not he or she owns a computer, and everyone can put their two cents in, which is the true spirit of democracy.

The Internet is egalitarian, and democratic societies strive to be egalitarian. Everyone has access to all the information that everyone else has posted. Granted, they must have a computer with a modem, but this is a service which more and more public libraries are offering free of charge. Everyone who logs on has access to all the information out there, so it is up to the user to decide what is bonafide information. Misuse of information could have serious consequences, but that is the risk that citizens in a democracy run if everyone has access to information, and is allowed to decide what to do with it.

Finally, in a democracy, the rights of individuals are important. Democratic principles may engender selfishness by placing emphasis on the individual, but the Internet allows people to be completely selfish: everyone can have as many websites as they want. The space is limitless because it doesn't exist.

If websites don't exist, then the Internet doesn't exist, and therefore true democracy doesn't exist either. When the clock strikes midnight on December 31, the moment of truth in the computer world will have arrived. If all the computers of the world fall apart, the Internet will disappear (along with true democracy) and the world economy will collapse because of something that never existed in the first place.

I guess Wendall will have to devote himself to boring a hole through my head. I wonder if that would look good on his resume.

Hunted by business

They've been after me for over a year now, tracking me down through all the usual documented channels. They claim I ripped them off for $463.68. And basically they're right. But of course there was a principle involved.

All this started back in the summer of 1998. Broke and desperate for work, I found employment at the Cheap-Ass Press Shop. This is not the real name of the company. I've changed it to avoid any potential lawsuits. Almost point really, since if they somehow get their hands on this column, then I'll have their goons kicking in my door by sundown.

I had a number of responsibilities at the Cheap-Ass Press Shop, most of them involving close proximity to toxic substances and molten ink. I had to try to operate printing presses that had been installed in the late 1920s without losing a finger to the diabolical machines. Every now and then, my bosses made me bag some foul-smelling canisters and throw them behind the dumpster. I'm fairly sure whatever was dumping was illegal, but this was Northern New Jersey, where environmental abuse is par for the course.

In case you're wondering what the end result of all these industrial highjinks was, we were responsible for putting the "Penn" logo on Penn tennis balls. It was a fine thing we did, and I went home every day brimming with pride that I'd done.

Sometimes a bird would meander into the warehouse and be unable to find its way out, flitting about among the light fixtures and stock shelves. This made for fine sport. My fellow employees would bust out some tennis balls and hurl them at the hapless avian. This sometimes killed the bird. My co-workers seemed genuinely surprised and remorseful when this happened. I'm not sure exactly what other result they expected from pelting a tiny, hollow-boned creature with Penn's quality tennis balls at such high velocities. I, myself, cannot condone such behavior for the obvious reason that it unnecessarily scuffs the felt of perfectly good tennis balls. That and killing birds is just mean.

I had to leave this blue-collar wonderland because of health reasons. My body was unable to adjust to getting up at six in the morning. So I gave them a day's notice. They promised to mail my last paycheck within the week.

The check never arrived.

August came and went. The first week of September I gave them a call, and inquired as to the whereabouts of my missing $102.12. They assured me the check had been sent in mid-August. All well and good, I said, but I never got it. Perhaps it was lost in the mail.

They agreed this was a possibility, given the incompetence of today's U.S. Postal Service. They told me they would cancel the lost check and send me a new one ASAP. I hung up feeling as though an understanding had been reached with the powers-that-be at the Cheap-Ass Press Shop.

A month later, here in lovely Amherst, I received a check for $565.80. They had paid me four times as much as they should have. How terrible, I thought. I'll return the money at once.

Then I noticed that the check had originally been for $585.80, but $20 dollars had been subtracted to cover the cost of canceling the check that had been lost in the mail. The cheap bastards had made me pay for it with money out of my own pocket. This seemed rather ignoble of them, as they were a successful business and I was a lowly college student. They couldn't cough up 20 bucks?

They tried to burn me. Returning the money was out of the question now. Nor could I save it in the bank – they would have sent some collection agency or other to fish it out. My only option was to spend the money quickly and recklessly before they realized their slip-up and set the hounds on my trail.

It's times like this that you realize what a great place Atlantic City is – a plastic and neon beast lurking off Exit 7 on the Garden State Parkway, waiting to swallow all your cash the moment you open your wallet. Like all predators, it can be used to your advantage when treated with the proper amount of caution and respect. If you need to blow $565.80 in a hurry, you'd be hard-pressed to find a more accommodating place than Atlantic City. And there's always the possibility that you will emerge a big winner. But this never happens.

I spent a weekend there on the boardwalk, and lost every dime I had to blackjack dealers, slot machines, and exorbitant room service bills. The drinks were free. My mission was a success.

Two weeks later the Cheap-Ass Press Shop sent me a letter telling me that I owed them $463.68. They didn't mention the $20 they'd robbed me of. I wrote them back a very polite letter in which I mentioned that I was very sorry that I hadn't noticed that they'd overpaid me, but at any rate returning the money was no longer an option as I had blown the money on a gambling spree which, sadly, did not end favorably for me. My current net value was $0, a figure my bank would be more than happy to verify. "While I would very much like to help you in this matter," I wrote, "I simply cannot give you money that I don't have. Perhaps you should find someone with better organizational skills to manage your accounts. Thank you for your understanding in this matter."

They were not pleased. They sent another letter in late December informing me that if I did not send them their money within the next two weeks, they would turn my case over to a collection agency.

They had drawn their line in the sand. Things were getting serious now. Fortunately, they were not aware that in two weeks time I would be taking up new residence in London, England, where logs on has access to all the thought. They'd get interminably mired down in some trans-Atlantic bureaucratic nonsense.

If you ever find yourself in bad trouble, I highly recommend leaving the country for a while.

Alas, London incurred its own strange debts. The $5,600 phone bill, for example, which has so far been easily handled. MCI keeps sending me letters demanding that I pay them this ludicrous fee. I keep sending them letters saying no. It's a vicious cycle.

Then there was the VCR we rented so we could keep The Big Lebowski playing in our flat ad infinitum. We rented it in February and kind of forgot about it, until the VCR rental people sent us a letter in late March informing us that we had accumulated a sizable late fee, in sterling pounds no less. We tried to pass that one off onto our neighbors. We simply told the VCR rental people that they had the wrong address. I don't know how that one turned out. I fled to Brixton in April, and never heard from the VCR rental people again.

It's been six months since I returned to the States, and the Cheap-Ass Press Shop seems to have lost my trail completely. Their much-vaunted collection agency has proved useless. My case is probably buried beneath a thousand others on some desk in some slate-gray office building overlooking the Hackensack River. But you must never grow complacent when in debt. The scoundrels will ambush you when you least expect it. Just look what happened to Han Solo in Cloud City.

I'm not an animal rights activist, and I don't eat tofu. I grew up on a diet of Philly cheese steaks and vendor hot dogs, yet somehow I am now one of those crazy vegetarians. More importantly – why aren't you?

There is so much more to vegetarianism than animal rights. You don't have to brake for squirrels to have just cause to eliminate animal products from your diet, but don't get me wrong, I love the little furry guys. A child dies of starvation every two seconds. This year

Brooke Werley

60,000,000 of the people living in America will die of starvation. The number of people who could be adequately fed by the grain saved if each American reduced their meat intake by a mere ten percent is the same figure: 60,000,000. More than five times our country's population could be fed by the grain and soybeans eaten by the United States' livestock. The amount of fertile land in our country is disappearing at rapid speeds. Three quarters of original U.S. top soil was lost as of 1987. The percentage of that soil loss, which is directly associated with the rising of livestock, is 85 percent. Any anthropology professor will undoubtedly admit that one historic cause of the demise of many great civilizations has been topsoil depletion.

If you spent this summer anywhere north of Maryland, you should remember the seemingly endless drought that plagued us to the point where we couldn't even get a glass of water at a restaurant without demanding it several times.

Well, perhaps you'd be interested to know where the water in the U.S. goes. I remember being told in elementary school that most drinkable water is wasted by flushing the toilet, but I know they never told me that more than half of all water used for any purpose in the United States goes to livestock production. The quantity of water used in the production of the average cow is sufficient to float a destroyer. What does this have to do with the green stuff? If you hold a job and pay taxes, part of your check goes to subsidize the meat industry's use of water. If it were not for those taxes, one pound of protein from beefsteak would cost $89.

We all know that college students live forever – they're invincible. But when four years of cheap beer and greasy chips begin to cause a bulge and a need for new pants, they begin to be confronted with their health. The most common cause of death in the U.S. is heart attacks. The average American man's risk of heart attack is 50 percent. For a vegetarian man, it is reduced to 15 percent, and for a vegan man it is four percent. Women who eat eggs daily are three times more likely to develop breast and ovarian cancer than women who eat eggs less than once a week.

Or maybe you're just here to have a little fun. Perhaps you spent some time at the beach this summer. Then you should know that one billion tons of waste from U.S. livestock in confinement operations is not recycled each year, and that it often ends up in our oceans. So, the surf in which you were frolicking contains the excrement of the same animal that yielded the hamburger you had at the Independence Day barbeque.

And speaking of hamburgers, think about McDonalds. Ronald McDonald was first played by Jeff Juliano. Juliano is now a vegetarian. He is in the company of the only man to win the Ironman more than twice, Dave Scott.

What's incredible is that I could go on elaborating on these points and addressing new ones. The point is that there is more to vegetarianism than slogans like "meat is murder." America's pre-occupation with a meat-centered diet is a cause for national concern. It has been ignored – like most problems – for far too long.

Anyone interested in learning more about a vegetarian lifestyle can begin by reading Diet For A New America: How Your Food Choices Affect Your Health, Happiness, and the Future of Life on Earth, by John Robbins.

Art and censorship by the new liberals

It used to be so much nicer when the lines between the conservatives and the liberals were so clearly drawn that it was easy to pick a side. Either a person chose to be one or the other, but being both was quite difficult.

However, now it must be lamented how the lines have blurred, and now conservatives do liberal things and liberals do conservative things and everything is all screwed up.

It used to be that the conservatives would protest anything that challenged their children when it came to schooling. "Don't teach," they'd say, and then the laundry list would begin, "evolution, Catcher in the Rye, complicated issues about slavery, the Holocaust, non-Christian beliefs, the achievements of women instead of men, the achievements of blacks instead of whites, blah, blah, and blah."

Sam Wilkinson

The liberals, when things were right with the world, would stand against the conservatives and say, "We must teach such things because, as difficult as they might be to discuss, they are important things that should be taught. They widen perspectives, help people to better understand history, and they educate."

But, oh, how those sweet lines have blurred, and now liberals are joining the other side. Here and there and everywhere liberals are standing against anything that demeans anybody.

Case in point. In our own little Western Massachusetts hamlet of Amherst, Camille Sola, a student at Amherst Regional High School, presented a petition signed by 158 other students to the Amherst Regional School Committee. She and the other signers are protesting the possible future performance of West Side Story by students because the play, they said, demeans Puerto Ricans.

It used to be that conservatives would have stood against the performance claiming that dancing was the devil's work or whatever, but now, a play about ethnic gang-violence, albeit with some singing and dancing thrown in, shouldn't be performed because it contains racial slurs and negative stereotypes, and characters use violence to solve problems.

Now apparently, if the play could have just told the story of a love that is prevented because of ethnic gang-violence without resorting to the use of racial slurs, negative stereotypes, and characters who use violence to solve problems, it would have been fine. It wouldn't have ever been a play, but it would have been fine by Sola and her supporters.

However, this shouldn't be fine by anyone else. This is another example of liberal censorship, a censorship done supposedly under the auspices of protecting people's sensitive minds. But it's getting ridiculous.

Art challenges what we think and what we know. It can be very uncomfortable, painful, hard, or dangerous, but that, in turn, is what makes art great.

Maybe West Side Story isn't art, but saying that a story that involves ethnic gang violence can't have any violence, nor can it have any of the racial slurs that come along with ethnicity, is flat out dangerous. What else would we have to get rid of just to sanitize our world?

We couldn't ever watch Schindler's List because there are ethnic stereotypes, racial slurs, and the use of violence by Nazis to solve a perceived problem. We couldn't ever read Huckleberry Finn because there are racial slurs said within Twain's pages. We couldn't ever perform Romeo and Juliet because violence is a huge part of the story, and the main characters end up committing suicide. We couldn't ever study the Civil Rights issues of the 60s because racial slurs are spoken, ethnic stereotypes are discussed, and violence is used.

And we would have to keep drawing the line. Every time that anything had the potential to become painful for anybody, we'd have to wish it farewell. Is that really a risk we are willing to take? Sacrificing everything that we could learn from such productions simply because they are potentially harmful to someone?

Art hurts, but not just for larks. There is, quite frequently, a point behind the pain. Are there racial slurs in a story that involves ethnic gangs? Of course there are. There are anti-Puerto Rican statements said by the white gang, and anti-white slurs said by the Puerto Rican gang. That's part of the story, part of the hate, part of the pain of the characters. The violence is also part of the story, as it is a story about rival gangs. Violence is part of it.

It makes the viewer uncomfortable. We don't like to hear racial slurs or ethnic stereotypes. We don't like to see violence.

Buckling under because someone might be offended by the play is the wrong way to go, and liberals used to know this. Liberals used to know that we couldn't rid ourselves of anything, because it might potentially offend someone. Liberals used to know that offense was part of the deal when it came to art.

But now, one would swear that the liberals are going the way of the conservative, and, instead of standing up for productions that challenge our minds, eyes, and ears, are happier just to protect everyone from potential pain. And that's the wrong way to go.

Liberals need to stand up against students like Camille Sola who seek to protect the world from pain through censorship. Liberals need to redraw the lines. Liberals need to understand that censorship, for whatever reason, is a dangerous risk to be taking, and rather than taking that risk, the liberals need to avoid it at all costs.

Some thoughts on swimming

There is nothing like the feeling of diving into the bitterly cool waters of Boyden pool at 5:30 in the morning all in the name of being part of the UMass Men's Swimming team. You see, I have been a member of the team for almost four years now, and I have been swimming competitively for the better part of my life. Swimming, for me, has helped me organize, as well as prioritize, my life. I wouldn't have been as focused on my academics if it hadn't been for the rigid schedule I had in elementary, junior high, and high school, if it hadn't been for this sport.

My father used to wake me up at 4:30 or 5:00 a.m. when I was young boy in order to cart me off to the Nashua YMCA for a two-hour practice. He would always have breakfast ready for me when practice was over. Then I would go to school and come back to do it all over again in the afternoon. My childhood was a haze of ultra-competitive swimming, which allowed me to make new friends and establish a unique work ethic that has lasted to this day.

Wes Wrightson

Reflecting upon my career as a swimmer, I can remember being one of the best in New England early on, but when I hit high school I hit a plateau. I got really burned out on swimming, and started playing other sports, though I still kept on swimming. However, in the past couple of years here at UMass, I began to enjoy the sport for what it offers to other areas of my life.

Our swim team is comprised of some pretty cool guys who come from different walks of life, yet share the common goal of winning. I believe that we are some of the hardest working athletes here on campus; I don't know of any other team on campus that can do what we do in the water. Our coach and assistant coaching staff pushes us to be our best in and out of the pool, yet they make it fun and interesting along the way. I used to dread going to practice in high school, but now in my senior year here in college, I sometimes look forward to it. I enjoy pushing myself to limits and seeing what I can accomplish.

Swimming has always been an outlet for me. What I mean to say is that while I swim during practice, I do a lot of thinking. I think about school work and problems in my life, but rarely about the task at hand. If I am frustrated about something, I take it out in the water.

Throughout my swimming career, I have been a distance swimmer, a breaststroker, and someone who does the Individual Medley (events which comprise all of the strokes). Right now, in my last year of swimming, I have come in full circle and am a distance swimmer once again. I like doing the distance because it, once again, gives me time to think about certain things in life.

"My childhood was a haze of ultra-competitive swimming, which allowed me to make new friends and establish a unique work ethic that has lasted to this day. "

Although the guys on the UMass men's swim team are great, I make it point not to get too wrapped up into the whole athletic scene here at school; I have made many good friends who don't play any sports here. That is the key to college: diversity. Make it a point to go out there and meet new people, don't limit yourself to just hanging out with one social group.

Finding time to socialize is difficult because athletes at high lives after a race), but the sport is pretty intense sometimes. Sometimes winning a meet comes down to the last event and that's exciting.

I have never really thought about my career as a swimmer until this year, my last year in college and my last season as a swimmer. Senior year has given me the opportunity to reflect on the place that swimming has in my life, and I have found a new appreciation for something that has been routine for so many years.

Pokemon drives me nuts

Yes, for those of you who normally see my ugly face plastered on this page on Fridays, you're absolutely right. I'm here on a Wednesday. Now, I could easily fight your claim. See, the University decided that Monday was a Thursday, and since I had no Monday classes on Monday, my Tuesday class was a Thursday because the only class that differentiates Tuesday and Thursday for me is one class, and that was canceled. I also had an RA staff meeting on Monday instead of Thursday, making my total for the week three Thursdays and one Wednesday, which is today. Since the University said that Monday was a Thursday, I'm going to go out on a limb and say that today is a Friday, so here's my column dammit! Get all that?

Ryan Benharris

Actually, I requested to write an extra column this week. There's an issue that I need to discuss that made me get up, turn my TV off, and walk all the way down the Collegian office to write an article. There's something very important that I needed to express to the entire university that I couldn't hold in any longer. Pokemon pisses me off!

Now, I'm not trying to offend any of you who love that little yellow thing (if that little yellow thing even is Pokemon – I refused to do any research for this article), but I'm just plain sick of it. When I turned on the television Monday morning and found out that Pokemon's First Movie ("First Movie" signifying that there will certainly be at least a second) made more than 58 million dollars in less than five days, I immediately felt the urge to become a cartoonist. The urge died when I remembered that I can't draw a straight line with a ruler.

Now, unlike my usual rants and complaints, this one actually has some substance. First of all, the news reported that on Wednesday November 10th, the first 50 people to attend an afternoon showing of Pokemon would receive a free Pokemon card. Now, maybe I'm missing something here, but don't most kids have school on Wednesday? I'm sure that out of the first 50 people, at least one of them was like the comic book store owner on "The Simpsons," but the majority of people who want to see Pokemon can legally attend a junior high dance (I say legally because I just heard the story of how Britney Spear's junior high date was the 18-year-old captain of the high school basketball team. I'm not making this up, and by the way, I just have to say, to that guy: 13-year-olds will get you 20 years in prison my friend.). This was definitely a terrific marketing campaign by Warner Brothers, but to actually encourage kids not to go to school so they can get a Pokemon card is simply not right.

The second reason why I hate Pokemon is a combination of news stories that I heard Monday morning. The first story was about a 10-year-old kid that beat up another kid to steal a Pokemon card. The fact that he beat him up is bad enough, but now the kid is facing felony charges, because the parents are pressing charges. This is a little excessive I think! My brother worked at a camp this summer, and kids were beating each other up all the time over Pokemon cards. Consequentially, the cards were banned from camp.

The next news story about the Pokemon craze was that of a 2-year-old child who died from choking on a Pokemon ball. Again, what are the makers of this crap thinking? No one should have to die because they choke on a toy. Pokemon's balls should come with a warning.

The last story about the stupid movie that I heard sent me over the top. Someone in Connecticut stole $1600 worth of Pokemon cards from a comic book store. Now, Pokemon isn't just a craze, it's a money making conspiracy. Although, wasn't that always what it was?

I guess part of my resentment toward the Pokemon craze is the fact that I can't be a part of it. When I was young, my parents dropped about 50 bucks for my family to go see the Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles Movie, and I'm still proud of it to this day. However, with this Pokemon crap, I just don't get it. How quick we are to forget that it was only three short years ago that little children in Japan were experiencing epileptic seizures from the colors changing on the television screens. We can't support this. The seizures need to stop! Pokemon needs to die!

Letters to the Editor

Take care of yourself

To the editor:

My name is Lisa Lipshires, and I am an administrative assistant here at UMass. Until two weeks ago, I always felt fairly safe here on campus, at least as safe as a person who has already experienced violence in her life can feel. When I was a freshman in college, at a small school in Wisconsin, a man assaulted me when I was doing my laundry in the basement of my dorm. I had just put my laundry into the washing machine and was sitting with my back to the door reading a book, when someone came up behind me, clapped a large hand over my mouth, and begin hitting me on the side of my head with his fist. Because of the size of his hand, I assumed it was a man who attacked me, and I also assumed that it was the same man whom I had seen a few minutes earlier, outside the laundry room, making a call on a pay phone. When I had seen him before, the man had asked me what time it was, and I had told him, with a smile, that I was sorry but that I did not know. Later, I was even more sorry that I had smiled at him, and had answered him so nicely. As many victims of violence often feel, I had thought that somehow, something I had done had caused the violence.

Like the student who was physically assaulted here this past Sunday, I too, had been able to scream for help and get away. Also, like her, I had been asked for information by my assailant before the attack. (I heard on the news today that one of the three men who assaulted the student on Sunday approached her first to ask her for directions.)

Many years later, when reading a rape prevention handbook, I learned that some rapists test the compliance of their potential victims by asking them for the time or for directions before attacking them. It's as if these rapists are sizing up their prey: is this a victim who will fight me and give me trouble, or is this someone whom I can assault easily with no negative consequences for myself?

For a long time after I was assaulted, I was hesitant to be friendly to any man whom I didn't know well, for fear that I would somehow be inviting violence. I was particularly on edge if a stranger ever stopped to ask me for directions. Gradually, though, I learned that, in situations where I felt safe and not threatened, it was okay to be friendly to men, even men whom I didn't know well.

But, I also learned that if I felt uncomfortable or endangered in a situation, I did not owe anyone politeness, a gracious smile, or an apology. My first and foremost responsibility was to get away and take care of myself. This can be a hard lesson to learn, especially for women. We are often taught that it is our job to put people at ease in awkward social situations, that we must be friendly and polite at all times, and above all else, that we must be available. Rapists, or people who intend other kinds of violence against us, may try to take advantage of the social conditioning that makes many of us feel that we should take care of others before we take care of ourselves.

I want to tell you here that if you ever feel that you are in danger, it's perfectly all right to walk away, run, scream, or make a big commotion. You also don't have to talk to anyone that you don't want to talk to, and you don't have to answer anyone's questions. You belong to yourself alone, and just because you have entered into public space, does not mean that you have surrendered ownership of yourself or of your right to say or yell "No!"

A final word
On Black Affairs

To the editor:

When I opened up the Collegian on Monday November 8th, I expected a reply from someone about my letter to the editor that targeted the Black Affairs page. I anticipated a response, a sort of continuation of a rather important conversation. Unfortunately, that was not the case. I was answered with an antagonistic article attacking my views, opinions, intelligence, and integrity. Am I angry? No. I just felt the need to thank Hugh Reid personally.

Maybe Hugh, (I can call him that because he seems to know me so well), was angry and sought to prove his nonexistent point through words of anger. Whatever the reason, I needed to thank him publicly for inadvertently proving the point that he was trying so hard to dismiss. In my letter, I asked why the page lacked substantive content, and he answered by dedicating half of his valuable page to me, an unintelligent complainer who is wasting her parents' money. The other half of the page gave the Washington Times and respondents the day off, and included two articles on an ESCA event of which my friend Hugh is the president. What a coincidence!

The four points he offered as an explanation for the use of La Tasha Green's art work were enlightening. Hugh seems to think that his interpretation should be universal, and he not only condemns me for having a contrary opinion, but deems me to be unintelligible.

I would like to thank La Tasha Green for attempting to engage in an intelligent conversation that was appropriate for a public forum, not a street fight. I appreciate her explanation and defense of her artwork. My criticism is not of the artwork of which she should undoubtedly be extremely proud. The issue at hand is whether or not it should be used to represent an entire community at a very diverse university. The answer to that question is still no. Her interpretation of her own artwork has no effect on how it is perceived by the public at large. My opposition is not meant "to hold us down, pull us back, and destroy us." My mission is to uplift, advance, and equally represent us.

So feel free to continue to berate me in print or in public because people's ignorance only becomes more apparent with each line they write against me. Every word dedicated to an attack on me instead of real issues not only proves me right, but further embarrasses them.

Philly's finest The Roots Come Alive with new CD

COURTESY / DANNY CLINCH

The Roots fourth album, The Roots Come Alive, is yet another instrumental and hip-hop masterpiece

By David Katzoff
Collegian Staff

THE ROOTS
The Roots Come Alive
MCA

The Roots do not just define the Next Movement...they create it. Through four uniquely outstanding studio albums, the 5th Dynasty has continuously affirmed themselves as hip-hop trailblazers. With an exquisite agglomeration of live instrumentation (keys, drums & bass), formidable (and underrated) lyricism from Dice Raw, Malik B. & Black Thought, and the dazzling oral antics of Rahzel, the Godfather of Noyze, they have veritably spoon-fed rap music with nutritious creativity. As brilliantly matured musicians and performance artists, the Roots have crafted their sound with boundless, polyphonic dynamism. Quintessentially, however, their own hunger to substantiate the hip-hop community remains linearly voracious. With Come Alive, Philly's Finest cultivates a wonderfully flawed, yet masterfully executed, concert-style rendering. Unlike the traditional "unplugged" fare, this album binaurally captures the raucous energy of stage spontaneity, and the lush, melodic rhythmalism of Kamal, Lennord Hubbard, and ?uestlove (the instrumentalists).

Not since BDP's revolutionary classic, Live Hardcore World (1991), has there been such an illustrious exhibition of auditory rap culture. Although the song selection is overwhelmingly contemporary (they covered nothing from Organix) and accessible to the Things Fall Apart band-wagoners, Come Alive is an optimal nuance because it revamps the familiarities with elaborate live splendor. Balancing their luxuriant musicality with the aggressive enunciations of raw emceeing, each element in their abundant orchestra is foregrounded both individually and concurrently.

After the introductory incites of Grandmaster Flash and the Furious 5, circa 1979, the album begins impeccably on rhythm with Rahzel's appropriate vocal amputations from the "Next Movement." The transition to "The Realm" is equally engaging as the beat flows secularly into Kamal's serene keyboards. Sensationally, the album manages to build up and sustain its vivid enthusiasm on songs like "Adrenaline" and "Proceed," and simultaneously attain mesmerizing tranquility on tunes like "The Notic" and "You Got Me." The GrassRoots appreciators can rejoice in the esoteric old favorites,
"Proceed,"
"Essaywhuman?!!," and especially "Silent Treatment" in which the Noyze Godfather softly croons the chorus. Common, who sounds happily fatigued spitting his majestic baritone, purisms in "Love of My Life." In a fabulous reprise of "100% Dundee," Black Thought rips the mic over an intricate drum pattern, and staccato keywork gingerly tapped by ?uest and Kamal respectively.

With "no additives, no preservatives" and strictly "no DAT's," the Roots skillfully culminate their six years of recording music. This album is testament to their unparallel consistency throughout the decade. Similar to Live Hardcore World and Bob Marley's Babylon By Bus, Come Alive is the consummate album for the living room CD player. The Next installment has arrived y'all, and once again by the undaunted Movement, we are fed. A

Disney tops Christmas specials

By Martie Zad
The Washington Post

The season to draw up Christmas shopping lists is upon us and children's videos are popular items. The season's offerings are plentiful and include:

The new "Mickey's Once Upon a Christmas," a 70-minute film narrated by Kelsey Grammer, features Disney's biggest and cherished animated star, Mickey Mouse, along with Minnie Mouse, Goofy, Donald and Daisy Duck celebrating the joy, laughter and friendship of the season.

Disney has two other feature-length Christmas releases, "Winnie the Pooh: Seasons of Giving," and, new to video, "I'll Be Home for Christmas" starring Jonathan Taylor Thomas. Each lists for $22.99.

Warner Home Video is filling Christmas shelves with 42 old favorites, including "How the Grinch Stole Christmas," "A Christmas Story" and "The Year Without a Santa Claus," each priced at $14.95. And to pump up the mil-looney-um, there's the trio of "The Looney Looney Looney Bugs Bunny Movie," "Bugs Bunny: Big Top Bunny" and "Marvin the Martian." Warner also is releasing the movie "Jack Frost" with Michael Keaton and Kelly Preston at $19.96.

Barney, too, can be under the tree. Lyricless holiday release is "Barney's Night Before Christmas" ($14.95), a successor to the purple dinosaur's best-selling "Waiting for Santa."

Christmastime favorites from Twentieth Century Fox Home Entertainment include Edmund Gwenn's "Miracle on 34th Street" ($14.95), Ed Asner's "The Story of Santa Claus" ($14.95), Arnold Schwarzenegger's "Jingle All the Way" ($29.98) and the 1938 version of "A Christmas Carol" ($29.98).

Golden Books Entertainment has three favorites, "Frosty the Snowman," "The Little Drummer Boy" and "Santa Claus Is Coming to Town." Each is $9.98.

Franklin, the lovable turtle from Nick Jr., has "Franklin's Christmas" among his $12.95 holiday releases. Warner Home Video is distributing a 90-minute special "Merry Christmas, Teletubbies!" ($29.98), and Columbia TriStar Home Video has released "The Nuttiest Nutcracker," a computer-animated story featuring the voices of Cheech Marin, Jim Belushi and Phyllis Diller ($12.95).

Paramount has shipped the Christmas titles from the Charlie Brown series, plus television favorites "Little Bear," "Gullah Gullah Island," "Allegra's Window," "Doug," "Rocko's Modern Life," "Ren & Stimpy" and "Hey Arnold!"

Anchor Bay spreads its holiday cheer with the re-release of "Baby Songs Christmas." $12.98. Call 1-800-745-1145.

Other new releases that make excellent Christmas gifts are "Bartok the Magnificent," featuring the sidekick from "Anastasia"; BBC Video's "Mouse House"; Disney's fully restored 60th anniversary edition of "Pinocchio"; Golden Books' "Madeline and the Pirates" and "Madeline in Hollywood"; Paramount's "Donkey Kong Country" and "The Iron Giant." "Madame Blueberry" has been added to the VeggieTales series; the Olsen twins have "Passport to Paris"; and HBO Home Video has "Babar: King of the Elephants." Lyrick Studios has released "Yummy Yummy" and "Wiggle Time," from the Australian children's show "The Wiggles," which came to Fox Family Channel this spring.

Donkey Kong Country is just one of the many family videos that eager children can be expecting in their stocking come Christmas Day.

NBC continues downward spiral

Last week I went to New York City and visited NBC studios in GE/Rockefeller Center. I saw the studios of "Dateline," "Saturday Night Live," "Later Today," and "The Rosie O'Donnell Show" (which still is giving me nightmares), and learned an important lesson in the process. For just $17.50 I learned that the once noble National Broadcasting Company has become something less than great. In fact NBC is now a sham of a network. Now that football and "Seinfeld" are no longer reaping the benefits for the network, it is reliant on just three shows: "Today," "ER," and "Late Night
With Conan [redacted] Nicholas Picardo
O'Brien." Because, face it, every other show on NBC is just awful.

"Saturday Night Live," despite its glorious past, has left its audience usually not laughing and asking themselves a simple question, "Why?" Most of the really funny people have left the show, and those few that remain are wasted carrying the show in every single sketch. Colin Quinn has slowly sunk the once smart and popular Weekend Update that Norm MacDonald added such blue-collared brilliance to. I just hope Lorne Michaels can rip off a couple more skits to make into movies while he still can.

As for other shows, well I'll try and keep this short. "Friends" is the only thing left of NBC's infamous money-maker "Must See TV." But who likes "Friends" anymore? We all know that Rachel still loves Ross and vice versa, of course they're too proud to admit it (unless they're drunk), so the show continues to run that storyline into the ground. As for Monica and Chandler, the reason that's going to last is because the show needed a new plot twist, and this development would lead all of "Friends" popular fan base (teenage girls) across the planet to coo, "They are sooooo cute together," and then more people would watch "Friends" again. Because we all know that the show is based on cuteness. As for Joey and Phoebe, we realize they are both morons, so that point doesn't need to be emphasized anymore, so move on, and that does not mean for them to have sex.

There is absolutely no reason for "Suddenly Susan" to still be on the air. All the funny people have left, so the show is stuck with Kathy Griffin and Brooke Shields, and all of their conversations are the same. I can tell you what this week's episode was about and I didn't even watch it: it had something to do with Susan's love life. Was I right? Of course I was, because every week it is the same thing. "Will & Grace" was new at first, but now it's redundant. "Just Shoot Me" is dumb, but it has David Spade in it, so it becomes tolerable. "Dateline" has Jeffrey Lantos Jarrosquette from "Night Court." Oh wait, they did and that didn't work either. The only thing CBS has going for it is football, which they also stole from NBC. Come to think of it, they stole most stuff from NBC. "JAG" was an NBC show, which they dropped. "Chicago Hope" is CBS's version of "ER." CBS even brought back Bryant Gumbel (known affectionately to the world, and his own mother, as "The Devil"). As for "Dr. Quinn, Medicine Woman," I don't care if the entire town trusts her, there is no way that a woman in the Wild West would practice medicine or even become a doctor. It's true CBS has "60 Minutes" but it just hasn't been the same since Ed Bradley got the gold hoop earring and Andy Rooney went crazy. Oh wait... he's always been crazy.

Before I go on left me just say that despite the popular love affair with "Dawson's Creek," the WB is not a network. No matter what you say or how loud you scream it will not change the fact that the WB is just a half-assed way for Warner Bros. to get more money. Any show that has 14-year-olds questioning their existence, and using words that most college students don't even know exist, should not save a network. Unfortunately, it's horribly addictive. If you don't watch it, please don't start, because you will need to watch every episode. For those of you who are like me that hate it but watch it anyway, there's a cure coming soon. I promise. Also, any show that's suppose to take place in or near Wareham, Massachusetts, should never be the savior nor the spotlight of a network. If you have ever been to the "Ham you would understand this.

ABC: There was once a time that TGIF was funny and ABC held an iron grasp on the ratings for Friday night. That, unfortunately, is not the case anymore. When TGIF began, it produced fantastic shows like "Family Matters," "Full House," "Perfect Strangers," "Dinosaurs," and "Mr. Belvedere." Wait, strike that last comment. Just "Mr. Belvedere," after all any show with Bob Uecker is worth watching. For a while ABC was just awful, creating awful show after awful show, referred to as the post- "MacGyver" years. Recently, however, ABC has showed a resurgence of power. Creating great sitcoms like "Spin City," "The Drew Carey Show," "Norm," and the hysterical "Whose Line is it Anyway," as well as the best show on television, "Sports Night." And if that's not a good reason to watch ABC, how about "Monday Night Football," and the ratings grabber and addictive "Who Wants to be Millionaire?"

But, despite all the good things that ABC as become, I feel that a relatively younger network needs support. This leaves the one and only FOX network. The network that started out as a joke by Rupert Murdoch, and now deserves more respect than the WB, UPN, and CBS combined. FOX is like the annoying little cousin of all the other networks, always begging them to take him with them. And when their "mother" (the FCC) makes them take little FOX with them, they just ignore him. The birthplace of the popular "Simpsons," "The X-Files," and the crudely hysterical "Married with Children," FOX started the current craze for reality TV with "COPS" and "America's Most Wanted." Not only does it have a variety of shows, which usually fail, but also they know the shows will fail. And some of the stuff they air takes some large brass cahoonies by whoever is in charge. Who but FOX would air Professional Bass Fishing instead of a four o'clock football game? I'm not kidding. Two weeks ago FOX actually had a counter during their football games to the beginning of Professional Bass Fishing. They treated it as a professional sporting event with graphics, theme music, stats, and even the FOX baseball announcers. How's that for respect? One week, your bringing the world the historical Red Sox and Yankees for the ALCS, and the next week your weighing a bass and guessing on what the current leader is using for a fly. FOX may not be the most stimulating network on TV, but let's face it – any programming schedule that has a three hour marathon of "COPS" followed by a collection of home videos of circus animals mauling babies, which advertise for other FOX shows that guarantee someone will either be rich, dead, or never able to walk again is a quality network.

UM Bikers ranked nationally after GA competition

By Catherine Turner
Collegian Staff

While the sky was cloudy and flakes flurried in Amherst this weekend, the Massachusetts Cycling Team joined 65 schools from all over the country in the warm sunshine of Helen, Georgia, at the National Collegiate Bike Races. Six riders from UMass competed in the cross-country, dual slalom, and downhill events.

"The sheer size of this event was bigger than a regular collegiate race," Ken Avery said. "It felt more like a regular national championship pro-race. Compared to last year it was a lot warmer and a lot easier to ride without snow on the ground."

The weekend began with the cross-country race on Saturday. The course was made up of four eight mile laps. For the conference riders from the Northeast, the hard packed Georgia clay was a change from the rocks and roots they're accustomed to on a trail. The relatively flat terrain and dirt was a contributor to the fast pace of the race.

Tyson Kaman and Donny Quimby represented the Maroon and White, both placing in the top 100. Quimby, ranked second in the conference, sailed in 61st with Kaman behind him in 85th after a flat tire in the first lap and a broken chain in the second. These mechanical difficulties prevented him from staying in lap with Quimby.

"I'm upset that it happened, but I still rode pretty well," Said Kaman. "I still finished, so I'm happy. The course was fast and had no place to rest. The strongest person was the one who'd do well. It was actually a lot like our course here on campus."

In the downhill competition, riders Jen Conlon-Kardian, Ken Avery, Marty Walsh, and Clay-ton Harper joined Quimby in a disappointing race. The course consisted of a trail resembling a road in the woods, with no jumps, drop-offs, or technical areas. The UMass riders finished in the middle half of the pack, disappointed in their performance due to the circumstances.

"Last time I checked, downhill races aren't supposed to have uphills in them," Marty Walsh said. "The winning top half of the downhill field were all cross-country racers on cross-country bikes. The sports are very different. It'd be like winning a cross-country race on a downhill bike, it's just not supposed to happen."

Slalom followed the downhill race on Sunday. The course started out with a double jump similar to the one in the UMass slalom course on campus. The 20 foot shute resembled the race at Easterns but was followed by three tightly bermed turns that exited into a four-foot high and 12-foot gap, double jump. Marty Walsh was claimed by the second jump in his second run, and just barely avoided careening down a 20-foot cliff.

"The slalom was very rhythmy. It felt like a BMX course," Ken Avery said. "You had to make sure that you maintained speed so you could clear the jumps, which was hard because the turns were very tight."

The head to head competition drew a crowd around the jumps as spectators watched the 105 men and 85 women try to qualify for the elimination rounds. In the top 16 of the mens race, Ken Avery qualified 13th and went on to win a national ranking of ninth. Jen Conlon-Kardian won second place in the national ranking, even after she gashed her shin with her chain ring, and needed nine stiches in her second run. The Minutemen bikers are already first in the Eastern conference, with Avery ranked number one in downhill.

Quimby had good runs in all three events, with a good second run in the slalom that was just short of qualifying for the final round. He and Clayton Harper both placed in the top 25.

Part of the disappointment felt by the riders was rooted in their frustration with the running of the entire weekend. All three events were littered with timing glitches and poor officiating, which may have cost the team some points. Inefficiency was noticeable in the slalom, when the last half of the riders were forced to ride in the dark.

"They had timing glitches in every single one of their races," Avery said. "That is unacceptable for a national caliber championship."

Colorado State, which won the weekend, and Lindsay Wilson College of Kentucky both include Cycling as a varsity sport and pour thousands of dollars into their teams for coaches, equipment and transportation to races. UMass riders don't receive any money from the school.

Another characteristic of the race was the representation of the entire country in one weekend. West Coast schools took on East Coast schools in a face off spanning four time zones. Though the majority of the other schools were far better funded and had a lot more support from their respective institutions, riders from the Rockies were forced to take notice of the Massachusetts talent.

While the Massachusetts riders didn't bring home any precious medals, they did beat long-time rival UVM and brought home two national rankings. Frustration might have been the underlying feeling during the race, but excitement definitely dominated the weekend.

"You can always see where you could have improved," Avery said. "I think two top-ten national rankings made for a pretty solid weekend."

MASSACHUSETTS SCHOOL OF LAW
Although it also produces highly intellectual programs seen on over 500 television stations and a general intellectual magazine that is read across the country, MSL's main focus is on teaching you the practical skills you need for success in law, business and government. We teach you to analyze legal, business and human problems, uncover facts and organize them logically, write well, be persuasive both orally and in writing, negotiate, arbitrate and mediate, try cases, and write specialized legal documents. And at MSL, you will be taught by experts who regularly practice these skills.
The non-specialized skills that we teach you, such as the ability to analyze problems, amass and organize facts, and write and speak persuasively, are needed not only in law, but are greatly desired in business.
MSL teaches you all these crucial skills at a tuition that is by far the lowest of any law school in New England – about half of the median tuition elsewhere in New England. The following chart of full-time tuitions illustrates this:

School 1	$25,550	School 7	$21,750	School 13	$17,075
School 2	$24,448	School 8	$21,200	School 14	$15,950
School 3	$24,090	School 9	$20,200	School 15	$14,850
School 4	$23,520	School 10	$20,150
School 5	$22,708	School 11	$19,084	MSL	$10,800
School 6	$22,054	School 12	$17,986

Horoscopes

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You're after complete control today, but the fact is that it's not entirely possible, no matter how hard you try. Strike a compromise.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Try not to stay up too late, and avoid burning the candle at both ends. Take more care of yourself at this time, and guard against fatigue and illness.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – An early start will give you the advantage today, but you must work hard to keep it once you've claimed it as your own. Form a careful strategy.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Don't waste a jot of energy today. Concentrate on your chosen objectives, and work steadily toward them with dedication and drive.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Keep your wits about you today. There are those who would try to take advantage of your generosity, and you'll have to draw the line.
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – There is no need for you to become uptight or confused at any time today. All is in order, and you should be able to keep it all under control.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You may feel as though you're on your own today, and indeed the big decisions are likely to be solely up to you. You can handle it!
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You'll get the help you need today, but here will be times in which you insist on doing things entirely on you own. Success can be yours.
CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You're likely to get more than you bargained for today, especially if you insist on continuing along your current path. Surprises are in store.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – A look back will shed some light on a current issue that has been hounding you for some time. You have the chance to put it behind you.
VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – As always, practice makes perfect today. It may seem that time is short, but you can use every second of it to your advantage right now.
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – See if you can do things "according to Hoyle" today, instead of bending the rules to suit your own personal needs. Play it straight!

Spurrier needs two starting with FSU for chance

It takes two to tango, huh?

Well, that's the Florida Gator system for you. That's why only Shane Matthews can boast of having a starting job at the next level, and with the Bears' recent success, even that is in question.

Brett Mauser on the Collegian staff

This weekend when the Gators host the Seminoles for only the 12th time in history, Steve Spurrier will instill a two-quarterback system, platooning Doug Johnson and Jesse Palmer to keep Florida State on its heels. FSU will counter with Chris Weinke, who finally gets a shot at the Gators.

Spurrier's theory is that it forces the defense to play a guessing game, having to guard against two different style play-callers. And in his defense, it's worked before. In 1997, the Gators shuffled Johnson and Noah Brindise in and out of the lineup effectively, upending Florida State in Gainesville, 32-29.

For some reason, though, the formula just doesn't sit with the rest of college football. Look at what Michigan did. Drop Drew Henson from the equation and Tom Brady goes the distance for the Wolverines in knocking off Penn State, 31-27, in Happy Valley. On the flipside, Arizona's tried it all season-long, but Ortege Jenkins and Keith Smith have turned the Wildcats into the nation's biggest underachievers.

Both teams have had close calls in games put on a platter. Florida State barely holding on to beat Clemson, 17-14, and Florida defeating Vanderbilt, 13-6. Against the Tigers, FSU got just 98 yards on the ground, hanging on thanks to three field goals from Sebastian Janikowski. Against the Commodores, Florida averaged just three yards a carry, dodging the turnover bug despite coughing up four balls.

The common thread? Vulnerability.

It hasn't been uncommon for both to seem invincible. With tickets to the Sugar Bowl still unsold, once again Florida/Florida State will have a direct impact on what the New Year holds. Virginia Tech did itself a favor by routing Miami, while Nebraska climbed the charts to number three in the rankings when the 'Huskers manhandled Kansas State.

A victory almost certainly propels Florida ahead of Nebraska as the 'Huskers head to Boulder to take on the Buffaloes of Colorado. Virginia Tech rounds out the season at Temple and then against No. 22 Boston College, for all intents and purposes, the Hokies are in unless they stumble.

It leaves Spurrier with an uneasy feeling. Obviously for the Gators, it's put up or shut up. There are no sugar plums if you can't win on Saturday. The Gators' loss at home to Alabama is the only blemish on the slate, but UF has stayed away from Mississippi State, Arkansas, and ranked non-conference opponents. In addition, victories against Tennessee and Georgia have come at the Swamp, playing just four games, all up-taken, on the road.

Chris Weinke tossed three scoring passes in last week's 49-10 romp of Maryland, a team who traditionally plays the 'Noles tough. Three went to Peter Warrick, who will likely match up with Florida's Bennie Alexander.

Turnovers, or lack thereof, could be the difference, as Florida comes in averaging 2.6 turnovers per game, the 12th best giveaways in the nation. A lack of efficiency on offense will lead to a Florida State luncheon.

The Gators need to stop Travis Minor in his tracks, the junior gaining 269 yards in their two previous meetings. This season, Florida gave up 106 yards to Alabama's Shaun Alexander and just 90 to UT's Jamal Lewis.

Florida will hang tough for a half, but FSU will show the rest of the nation why it's in a league of its own. If Minor's on, Weinke to Warrick will shred a Florida secondary who yields 240 yards a game through the air.

Bobby Bowden gets his wish, a win against the Gators. Giving 3 1/2 at the Swamp, I'll gat with the 'Noles.

Last week: 1-4
Overall: 21-23-1

Who else doesn't buy this Boston College business? If last week was any indication, a victory over Syracuse shouldn't warrant a Top 25 arrival. But it did, and now the Eagles are talking Bowls despite losing to Temple, which is just a sin in itself.

This week, they travel to South Bend to take on 5-5 Notre Dame. BC will get a nice little wake-up call. Giving 9 1/2, gimme the Irish.

With the rest of the nation and the theory still standing, I'll take Michigan State at home against Penn State, giving 1 1/2. On top of that, give me Ole Miss, giving 5 1/2 against Georgia, and Mississippi State with 7 1/2 at Arkansas.

Shipp named A-10 Player of the Week

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

With 210 yards and all three of the Massachusetts football team's touchdowns in their 23-16 victory over William & Mary on Saturday, running back Marcel Shipp was awarded the honor of this week's Atlantic 10 Offensive Player of the Week heading into this weekend's crucial regular season finale against Connecticut.

The naming marked only the second time Shipp has captured the award, both this season.

With two consecutive 21-yard scampers in the third quarter of this weekend's win over the Tribe, No. 5 moved past the revered Renc Ingoglia into first place in the history of UMass, with 4,728 yards over almost three seasons. So far this year, the junior has amassed 1,430 yards and 17 scores, statistics impressive enough to keep him in the middle of the race for the Walter Payton Award, given at the end of the season to the best offensive football player in Division I-AA football.

With less than three seasons under his belt, Shipp has moved into second place in the history of the A-10. The career leader in that list is New Hampshire's Jerry Azumah, who terrorized the Minutemen for four years before graduating last Spring and heading off to join former UMass linebacker Khari Samuel with the Chicago Bears. Azumah racked up 6,193 yards in his stint as a Wildcat, leaving Shipp a mere 1,465 yards behind.

At his current rate, the Maroon and White superstar will surpass the speedy UNH back roughly this time next year. Unlike Azumah, who is the only player in the history of the nation to record four straight 1,000-yard seasons, Shipp will be vying for the mark having spent most of his freshman campaign splitting time in the backfield with veteran runners. Still, the youngster rushed for 756 yards, a number never before reached by a Massachusetts rookie.

As a sophomore, No. 5 recorded the best season on the ground of any UMass player ever. Shipp tallied 2,542 yards and 18 touchdowns, while still pulling in 39 receptions for another four scores.

This season, Shipp most likely has at least two more games to work with, as his 13th-ranked squad is heavily favored to defeat UConn and proceed into the playoffs. Averaging 143 yards a game, he figures to end the season with about 1,700 yards. The versatile tailback has already passed last year's receiving total with 42 catches to his credit as of yet.

When the Huskies come to town on Saturday, Shipp will look to add to those lofty statistics as a byproduct of the team's already-in-place motivation to win. UConn was responsible for two of the Minutemen's three losses in their National Championship run last season. In those two games, Shipp posted a total of 446 yards, averaging 6.6 yards a carry.

Dodgers' Beltre allegedly signed at age 15

By Ross Newhan
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES - Baseball's investigation into the alleged illegal signing of third baseman Adrian Beltre by the Los Angeles Dodgers is not expected to be completed quickly.

"It could take several weeks, and I would certainly expect it to last into December, particularly in light of the Thanksgiving season and the possible necessity of travel to the Dominican (Republic)," Sandy Alderson, baseball's executive vice president of operations, said Monday.

Alderson confirmed he has received an inquiry request from Scott Boras, Beltre's agent, and will be supervising the investigation.

Boras claims that Beltre, who completed his first full season with the Dodgers this year but his fifth in the organization, was signed by the Dodgers at 15, rather than the required 16 for foreign players who are not subject to the draft, and should be declared a free agent.

The Dodgers have refused comment, other than to say they will cooperate and have already sent pertinent paperwork to the Commissioner's office.

Asked if there were a statute of limitations from the time of the alleged illegality and the request for an investigation, Alderson said that would be "part of the inquiry and analysis of the relative precedent." He added, however, that he could not recall a case in which there has been such a passage of time, and, depending on results of the investigation, that could impact the type of penalty levied on the Dodgers.

The investigation is being launched in the aftermath of Beltre's impressive 1999 season, during which he hit .275 with 15 home runs and enhanced his market value as a potential free agent.

Cy in Boston Pedro: MVP?

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

Cy Young returned to Boston yesterday, not in spirit, but in the form of hardware as Pedro Martinez was named the American League Cy Young Award winner. Martinez captured all 28 of the first place votes en route to his second award in the last three seasons.

The Boston ace became only the third player in major league history to win the honor in both leagues (he won the award in 1997 with the Montreal Expos). The other two players to win the Cy Young in both leagues were Gaylord Perry (Cleveland '72 and San Diego '78) and Randy Johnson (Seattle '95 and Arizona '99).

Martinez, the master of the changeup, posted one of the best seasons in the history of baseball, posting a 23-4 record while having an astonishing 2.07 ERA, and striking out 313 batters.

His statistics are more impressive when you break them down. His 23-4 record bested runner-ups, Aaron Sele, Mike Mussina, and Bartolo Colon who all had 18. His league best 2.07 ERA was .65 better than teammate Bret Saberhagen who came in second at 2.72. The most impressive of all his numbers was that the 313 strikeouts were 113 better than Chuck Finley's effort.

His numbers in September were 4-0 with a 0.88 ERA, and 70 strikeouts while baffling the Yankees in New York by pitching a one-hitter (a home run to Chili Davis), and striking out 17. Opponents hit .089 in his last seven appearances of the season.

What is the next piece of the puzzle for the All-Star Game's most valuable player? Is it the AL MVP?

Martinez's numbers in most years would be enough to run away with the award, but in a year that offenses reigned supreme, will they be?

Perhaps the biggest case for MVP is put forth by fellow Red Sox Sosmar Garciaparra. Nomar had 190 hits, 140 RBI, and led the AL with a .357 batting average.

Garciaparra posted these numbers while being hampered with a sore hamstring and an inflamed tendon in his right wrist. Nomar did all this with Troy O'Leary batting behind him most of the season. To top it off, he was solid in the field, and kept the Red Sox in the pennant race while Pedro was on the disabled list, after a sore shoulder sidelined him for most of the month of July, stifling his attempt at a 30 win season.

Rooks are a rush, but vets rule NBA

Steve Francis talks the talk. Lamar Odom walks the walk. Elton Brand is already the biggest Bull in the running, and Richard Hamilton has finally gotten a chance to Rip, now that Mitch Richmond is ailing as well as aging.

Welcome to Romper Room, NBA

Adam White on the NBA

style. The league has gone to desperate lengths to force its high-profile youngsters down the throats of hoop heads everywhere, in an attempt to salvage its tarnished image. And while these killer kids of the court have certainly hit the ground running in '99, there are a few seasoned hoop soldiers who are making quite a statement even as the NBA seems ready to bury them.

Take the Indiana backcourt, for example. After rolling into the strike-shortened '98 slate as consensus picks to win it all, the Pacers were widely written off this year as being too old to go for the gold. But by the time Reggie Miller and company strutted off the hardwood in Houston Monday night, they had given Francis, Shandon Anderson, and Cuttino Mobley a thorough lesson in how guards win games.

Miller and Mark Jackson combined to rip the Rockets for 30 points on 50 percent shooting from the field, while fellow senior sniper Sam Perkins hit two huge trifectas down the stretch for the Pacers. Francis and Mobley, meanwhile, combined to go 2-for-9 from beyond the arc and committed five turnovers between them as Indiana prevailed, 96-87.

School was also in session in New Jersey Monday night, as the host Nets had chips on their shoulders, but ended up losing their heads in a 100-92 loss to Seattle. After running his mouth instead of the offense through much of the Nets' 104-89 loss to Phoenix last Wednesday, NJ whiz kid Stephon Marbury put on another display of b-ball immaturity against Seattle. Marbury showed he subscribes to the Allen Iverson school of shoot-first, involve-teammates-later mentality, shooting a dreadful 8-for-22 from the field while dishing out just four assists.

Marbury's assignment on defense, meanwhile, showed yet again why his "old dog" game fits into the "new tricks" NBA rule system like a Glove. Gary Payton came within one assist of a triple-double, shredding Marbury for 16 points, 11 rebounds, and nine assists. Payton's prowess also opened up the floor for 34-year-old Vernon Maxwell, who rocked the Nets for 21 points.

The undeniable talent of Odom hasn't been enough to rescue the hapless Clippers, who were mangled by the Grizzlies 109-89 Sunday. Odom was everywhere in the loss, racking up 16 points on 6-of-12 shooting while grabbing 12 boards. But one question still plagued the Clips: who can take Odom, as talented as he is, and provide the outlet he needs to beat the imminent double team? Why, the Kandi man can, of course. Michael Olowokandi is finally lending some justification to his selection as the top pick in the '98 draft, as he put up 14 points and snagged 11 rebounds in the loss Sunday.

But the exploits of LA's raw roundballers paled in comparison to those of the sensational Vancouver frontcourt. Shareef Abdur-Rahim and Othella Harrington single-handedly sank the Clippers, combining for 39 points on 16-of-22 shooting, while amassing 16 boards and 11 assists between them.

Saturday's war between Minnesota and Phoenix featured two of the biggest names in the class of '99, Shawn Marion and Wally Szczerbiak, going head-to-head. Marion turned his 26 minutes of floor time into a 13 point, four rebound showcase, while Szczerbiak put up 18 points and five boards in 32 minutes of action. You'd have to give the edge to Szczerbiak. The Timberwolves treated the home crowd to a 111-100 win.

Any conversation about aging veterans still ruling the roost simply has to include Utah. Even as rookie Scott Padgett has morphed into a starter for Jerry Sloan, wizened warriors Karl Malone and John Stockton continue to defy Father Time and carry the luz to win after win. Monday's 91-85 shocker over defending champ San Antonio was yet another message game for Utah's elites: each scored 20 points and the pair combined for 14 boards and seven assists.

And in what is by far the strangest of this year's rookie chronicles, Dallas forward Leon Smith was confined to a psychiatric ward after an episode Sunday night in which Smith reportedly overdosed on aspirin. Police responding to a criminal mischief call found the 21-year-old Chicago native unconscious on the floor of his Dallas apartment, with green paint covering his face. Upon revival, the first-year Maverick resisted officers while proclaiming himself "...an Indian...fighting Columbus."

Rookies making impact on NHL rosters

By Helene Elliott
Los Angeles Times

NHL rookies have traditionally served unit members buying dinner for their teammates.

But an impressive number are making an impact this season, suggesting they will be seen and heard for a long time.

"It's nice to see young guys making an impact. It's fresh air and fresh legs for the team," said Michel Goulet, vice president of player personnel for Colorado. "Maybe with the salaries going up, teams are looking for more kids. And you're going to have years where sometimes the draft is better than other years."

Colorado has 1999 Calder winner Chris Drury and third-place finisher Milan Hejduk. This season, Avalanche goalie Marc Denis, left wing Alex Tanguay, and defenseman Martin Skoula are Calder contenders. No team has had consecutive winners since 1966-67 and 67-68, when Boston's Bobby Orr and Derek Sanderson won.

"Drury and Hejduk were really a force for us and they got better as the year went on," Goulet said. "I don't believe in the second-year jinx, and I think they will continue to get better. Skoula and Tanguay are the same type of guys. They're smart players and will improve as they get more confidence."

Colorado's newcomers face formidable competition. Buffalo goalie Martin Biron, groomed as Dominik Hasek's successor, has played well while Hasek recovers from a groin injury. John Grahame, son of former NHL goalie Ron Grahame, has been so effective that the Bruins kept three goalies after Byron Dafoe signed a new deal.

Center Scott Gomez, an Alaska native and the first NHL player of Latino heritage, leads the Devils in scoring with three goals and 18 points, left wings Steve Kariya and Peter Schaefer have been catalysts in Vancouver's early success, and St. Louis center Jochen Hecht has earned a regular spot.

Defensemen are represented, too. Frantisek Kaberle, 26, has made a smooth transition from Sweden to the Kings' top four, and 20-year-old Brian Rafalski is a regular with the Devils after six years in Europe. San Jose's Brad Stuart, 20, may be the best of the bunch, playing more than 21 minutes a game and contributing on offense.

"With expansion, teams have lost players who would have been their ninth through 12th forwards, and fifth to seventh defensemen, and they're giving that time to young players who can play," Kings General Manager Dave Taylor said. "With salaries nowadays, teams are paying a lot of money to first-round picks and they're good players, so they want to play them."

Taylor praised Gomez as "very skilled, very good with the puck." He also likes Kariya and Stuart. "Kariya's not very big, maybe 5-6 and 160 pounds, but he does have quickness, even if he doesn't have (older brother) Paul's high speed," Taylor said. "He's creative and he works his tail off. The ones that are succeeding are the ones with good skills. (Stuart) has lots of tools. He's an offensive-minded defenseman."

No rookie will duplicate Teemu Selanne's 76-goal, 132-point rookie season with Winnipeg in 1992-93, but the talent of this class bodes well for the future.

STATE OF THE UNION

The number of suspensions and games missed by perpetrators hasn't increased since last season, despite such rulings as the ten-game suspension to Mighty Duck defenseman Ruslan Salei. Colin Campbell, the NHL's director of hockey operations, hopes that means the league has made a point.

"We like tough hockey, contact hockey. We like collisions, but we want fair collisions," he said Monday. "I think the message is getting through about elbows and hitting from behind, but hopefully, the message is getting through about the hits that deserve suspensions."

Campbell has heard the theory that illegal hits result from a lack of respect among players, but he said that's no excuse.

"You see these teams not as often as in the past. In the six-team league, it was necessary to have respect because you'd see a team 13 times, and if you see a team once a year, it's not the same. But it's an easy thing to cop out. There are a lot of things involved, but I don't think you can peg it to a lack of respect."

Scoring was up slightly in the first 243 games, from 5.27 goals a game to 5.43, but interference and obstruction-related fouls decreased from 382 to 227. Penalty minutes were down to 27.8 a game, from 37.4, and fighting majors were at 264, compared to 335 last season and 376 in 1997-98.

In addition, NHL spokesman Gary Meagher said the league is aware "there's a problem" in understanding the regulation-tie category in the standings, and will study how to clarify it. Under new rules, teams get a loss and a regulation tie if they lose in overtime, which can create confusion over how many games a team has played.

WORKING OVERTIME

The Calgary Flames opposed the switch to a four-on-four overtime format, but they have profited from it. All five of their victories have been recorded in overtime, and they also have two ties.

Winger Valeri Bure attributed the Flames' overtime success to their fitness and style.

"We skate a lot and do a lot of skating drills, and when we get into overtime, I think we have a lot of juice left," he said. "We have a really good skating team. Our club is really skilled and we've got a good mixture. (In) four on four, you've got to be able to skate really well because it's open-ice hockey...."

MUCK AND MIRE

When the Rangers play the Bruins on Thursday at Boston, they might have a new coach.

John Muckler apparently saved his job when the Rangers won at Chicago Nov. 7, but a 4-3 loss to Ottawa put him back in the hot seat. The Rangers rallied to beat Washington last Thursday, but a listless home loss to Boston on Saturday might have sealed Muckler's fate and set up the promotion of John Paddock from their Hartford farm team.

The Rangers are 34-44-15 at Madison Square Garden since 1997-98, awful even in an era when home ice isn't the advantage it once was. And it's the home games the corporate suits attend and care about most.

The Rangers apparently don't realize spending a lot isn't the same as spending wisely. Winger Valeri Kamensky has been hampered by problems with the arm he broke last season. Theo Fleury has found the going tougher in the East, and defenseman Kevin Hatcher played himself out of the lineup. Petr Nedved lacks the character to be a first-line center and few of his teammates are self-starters.

Who's in charge may not matter. The Rangers have some young talent, but Muckler hasn't allowed it to develop. As a team, they lack the finesse to play a skill game or the tenacity to be scrappy. General Manager Neil Smith has been living off the team's 1994 Stanley Cup triumph too long.

Steps taken to curb campus fear

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

After three assaults on campus in less than 14 days, students gathered Tuesday to protest campus violence. An hour and a half into the rally, another student was assaulted in Lot 63 next to Skinner Hall.

A day after the fourth assault, the Student Government Association and the University's administration continued to work on the problem, while the University of Massachusetts Police Department continued to investigate the attacks.

On Nov. 2, a female student reported being raped at 5:30 p.m. near the Campus Pond. On Nov. 9, a female student reported being raped in bushes near the Metawampee Lawn at 2:30 pm. Last Sunday, a female student reported being pepper-sprayed by three individuals who then punched her before she was able to break free and escape.

The UMass Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs, Javier Cevallos, said he was hoping that the University has seen the worst of the attacks, saying that the four assaults that have occurred have been "four too many."

John Luippold, the chief of the UMPD, clarified some of the information about Tuesday's assault, saying the woman attacked was a UMass student and that the knife recovered was a common kitchen knife. He added that, contrary to some rumors, she was standing outside of her automobile when she was attacked.

Luippold said he was concerned about rumors and how quickly they are spreading.

"We need people to confirm what they are hearing before spreading the information on to other people," Luippold said.

Barbara O'Connor, deputy chief of the UMPD, also expressed concern about the rumors that were circulating.

"The rumor mill and inaccurate information that is circulating is a possible hindrance," O'Connor said. "We can't control what people are going to tell one another and what they're going to hear, but we want people to focus on the public safety alerts that are out there."

O'Connor went on to say her department was not in the business of hiding crimes, and that the University administration was trying to control the level of hysteria.

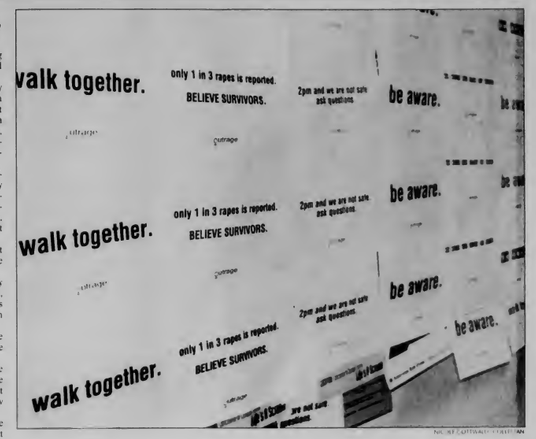
Jeff Howe, the president of the SGA, felt that University administration had not done enough to focus on the assaults when they first began.

"After the first assault, students were not given any information about what had happened to a student less than 100 yards from a building they were supposed to feel safe in," Howe said. "We [the SGA] raised the issue as to why there wasn't more coverage or information available and we were told it was an isolated incident. The University was more willing to put their public perception ahead of students' well-being."

O'Connor said earlier yesterday that the police department was in a position where it had to keep a great deal of information private for a "great many reasons." She said that, as a result of having to keep information private, the UMPD was becoming an easy target for criticism.

However, Howe said he saw a difference between the University administration and the UMPD, saying the administration had a responsibility to keep communication open, whereas he felt the police department did not serve the same role.

Seth Avakian, the SGA Student Trustee, added that only now was the University doing what it should be.



"After the second assault, security was beefed up," Avakian said, adding that he cannot look out his office window without seeing an officer around the pond.

But Avakian said there could be 100 extra officers available and the campus still would not be covered.

O'Connor agreed, saying the UMPD is not omnipresent, as is the case with any organization that attempts to oversee a University campus.

Howe said he did not want the University to glorify the assaults, but rather just the students told of what had happened. Avakian has heard that, as an answer to some of the

SGA recommends new safety measures

By Mary Grein

The Student Government Association (SGA) passed a motion at their regular meeting last night resolving that faculty members allow excused absences and full academic clemency for the period of Nov. 15 to Nov. 30, 1999 to students due to the fear caused by the recent incidents on campus.

The motion states that many students feel the campus is "an unsafe environment," and that the student body should not have to compromise their safety in order to take notes and complete assignments. The decision of class attendance would be ultimately up to the discretion of individual professors.

Acknowledging that students are still fearful, Trustee Seth Avakian stressed that everyone on campus was working to the best of their abilities to make the campus as safe as possible. He also spoke of the many rumors that have been circulating around campus. "The rumors have to end. The rumors are going to hurt us even more," Avakian said.

"We are not going to let anyone take over this campus," President Jeff Howe said. "We can't let this issue die, we can't forget, we can't stop putting pressure on the issue." It was announced that another vigil would be held during Tuesday afternoon, Nov. 23, 1999. The SGA is working together with other organizations on campus to finalize the details.

A second motion involving the safety of students was also passed last night. It involved creating a shorter walk between the Grayson and Field Residential halls in Orchard Hill and the purple parking lot by allowing card assess to the door closest to the lot during hours that security was not in the building. Presently students wishing to enter the building have to walk all the way around to the entrance, constituting a safety hazard for many students returning late at night.

Many concerns were raised on this issue, while the question was asked whether having the door accessible created more of a safety issue. According to resolution review, the Select Committee on Safety negatively recommended the motion. Chair Ken Campbell said, "There is no need for a door to be open there. Those doors are often propped open creating more of a safety issue - who knows what will happen." The notion was brought up in debate that the real issue was one of convenience and not safety.

Howe disagreed saying that having the door available for the use of the residents was not going to increase the number of strangers entering the building. "It would prevent students from having to walk around the building. This is a safety issue," Howe said.

He went on to say that the area is very poorly lit, making many students in the area unnerved once again for their safety as they walk from their car to their room.

In another effort to make students feel safer, a motion was passed to allow students traveling to night classes to park in the green, red and blue parking lots after 5 p.m. The spaces are mainly designated for staff parking working during the hours of 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. It would exclude handicap, residential director and area residential spaces.

The motion stated that students are at a higher risk to attacks due to a lack of lighting on campus and therefore should have access to spaces closer to the buildings where they take classes. It was further passed that all students be exempt from parking violations between the hours of 5 p.m. and 7 a.m. for the remainder of the semester.

The administration will have to concur with the proposals passed in the motion before it can be enacted.

Student expresses fear, anger over violence

By Andrea M. Peers

Violence has become a reality at the University of Massachusetts for the student body as a whole, but for women in particular. A Collegian reporter spoke with a female student about her concerns with the recent alleged assaults, alleged rapes and safety issues that have shaken this campus in the past two weeks.

This female student, who wishes to remain anonymous, is a nursing major at the University. This fall marks her first semester here as a freshman. She said she no longer feels safe here, and her reality of UMass is not at all what she anticipated.

"I don't like feeling that I'm not safe. I was comfortable with this place, and that's why I chose UMass," she said. "I don't feel like I am at home anymore. This used to be home, but I want to leave now. I'm out of here if this continues. I will transfer. I don't want to put up with this for four years."

Her expectations of UMass were that of any other student. She chose the University because of the nursing program, and saw the chance for opportunities, socially and academically. But, as she explained, her view of campus has changed dramatically.

"I definitely had high expectations, socially and academic wise. But I also had high expectations for campus safety."

She recalled orientation and safety walks which informed her of the Escort Service, call boxes and other resources on campus that would make students safe. However, she no longer feels these are working. She told a story of her friend who works every night to pay for school, and returns back to campus at around 11 p.m. She had called the Escort Service twice in the last two weeks to be taken home from the parking lot, which was far from her dorm, and both times she received a rude answer, and no service.

"They said to her: 'Don't you know it's raining out? We're very busy right now. You going to have to call back.' That's what they said to her."

Her friend called back again a few days later, the day after the first rape was reported, to be driven home from the library. Again, as she explained, her friend was not helped.

"They said: 'Oh, can you call back. It's busy. We'll probably be a half hour.' I can't believe it. Is it safer to wait around in the dark and stand

Gendered perspective: A male point of view

By Andrea M. Peers
Collegian Staff

The anger students on the University of Massachusetts campus may be feeling can be different from a male's point of view, as opposed to a woman's point of view. Women have been the victims of the crimes of the past two weeks, but men across campus have shown their support to end this violence against women. In an interview with a female student, a Collegian reporter found out the other side of the story.

This male student is a freshman nursing major who wishes to remain anonymous. He discussed issues that are being brought up aside from violence. The stereotypes of men and the safety and the reputation of UMass were only some of the topics he chose to talk about.

When he first applied to the University, he was looking for the big-school atmosphere and the quirks that came along with a large student population. The nursing program was especially impressive to him, and he also liked the location. He could be away from home, and stay close to his friends at the same time. The reputation this University had in academics was also an attraction.

"I wanted that big school atmosphere, and I thought it was a good school to go to," he said. "The academic records of UMass made me choose this place as my home for the next four years."

But he said his view of campus has quickly changed to a negative one over his first few months in college. Safety always seemed like a big part of the school, and this was another attraction on campus.

"I have a lot of friends that go here, and for the most part, I thought it was a pretty safe campus," he said. "I didn't have the impression that this was a violent campus before I came here or anything, but maybe that's being a little naive."

He said that four incidents within one month are scary when it is your first semester at college. He thought that this campus would never be a place where people would get hurt in this way.

"It's like a big city. There's over what, like 20,000 people in this place? I just don't feel as comfortable here anymore as I used to be."

He also talked about some of the discrimination and hostility that he is receiving because he is a male. He said many girls now question every man on this campus, and he felt that guys are taking the heat for the actions of other men who are attackers or rapists.

"I don't like the fact that when I'm walking behind a girl, she will get scared and give me a dirty look or a bad look. I scare girls now," he said. "I know it's not their fault, but I just feel that I should be walking around on campus with a bright orange shirt that says 'I'm not a rapist!!' And I don't like to be looked at like this, just because I am a guy."

He said one of the problems involving the violence was the problem with safety on campus. The Escort Service was a target for major problems after he had a group discussion in two of his classes. The group responded to the long waits, bad service and rude comments that had been received when they attempted to be safe and use the escort service.

"From what I heard, a while back they were going to stop it because people were taking advantage of it, but what would happen if they did? I don't think it's nearly as good as it should be."

Women and men in the class shared similar experiences dealing with the service.

"In one of my classes, people said they had called and were told that they have to wait half an hour to 45 minutes for a van. What difference is one extra van really going to make? I don't see the extra police, and I don't see how they are making an effort to do anything about it."

In terms of increased safety, he agreed that people are walking in groups and taking the necessary precautions. He said that any effort to keep people safe would be a solution to the continued violence.

"It all goes back to people need to feel safe around here, so if you're walking your friends to class is working, then yeah, that's what people need to be doing," he said.

He said he sensed that most people are hesitant to talk to other people, and anyone for that matter on campus. He argued that this changes the whole reason why people come to this school.

"You walk around campus now and you can feel people being nervous when they are walking just by the way they act. The atmosphere of campus has definitely changed."

He felt that the administration is ignoring the problem, and the bottom line for him and his friends is that nothing is being done. He talked about Chancellor David K. Scott's speech at the Tuesday vigil and his ideas for long term solutions, but questioned what the solutions are going to prevent.

"What is adding one more call box, or one more police officer going to do? They could really do more than they are doing," he said. "I don't see anything being done. My friends came up to me, and they don't see anything either. Obviously the students don't feel like the administration is doing anything. I see signs up all over the place telling us how to be safer, but you know it's just a sign. What actions are actually being taken?"

He also offered solutions to increase awareness and a sense of safety. He suggested the possibility of a mandatory meeting on violence in all residence halls, to promote safety and have workshops. Self-defense classes would also be an alternative. All jokes and comments of any nature relating to the violence have to end, he said. He stressed the importance of helping friends out, walking them to class and just being aware of your community.

"If you feel unsafe, you need to look at why you feel that was and change that. Being paranoid about everything will just eat away at you," he said. "These guys look for people who are vulnerable, and who ever these guys are, they are really quite sick. They're just going to end up hurting other people if this continues."

He said that because he is a freshman in his first semester, he understands the reputation that other students will see because of the recent violence. The reputation of this school, he said, has changed for the worst because of the crimes, and this will reflect negatively on admissions, and other parts of the system. He said he wouldn't be surprised if people reconsider when they go to look at UMass. The image now is that the school is not safe, he said.

"Every school has its skeletons tucked away in the closet, but, I mean, any violence like rape reflects really negatively against the school. It's a shame that this school has to take the blame for this, because this is a really good school," he said. "It really angers me that this stuff has happened, but I guess you don't really take a look at the big picture until it hits home, and it's definitely hitting campus right now."

rumors, a website and hotline might be set up offering all available information about assaults. Student who heard rumors of assaults could log on or call to confirm whether or not what they have heard is accurate.

For their part, the SGA has accumulated at least $2,500 in promised money to offer as a reward for the arrest and prosecution of those responsible for the assaults.

"We have $500 from the SGA, another $500 from the Panhellenic Council, $500 from UPC [University Productions and Concerts], $500 from Campus Activities and $500 from the Programming Board," Howe said.

Cevallos said UMass-Amherst Chancellor David K. Scott and he would probably be willing to offer matching funds for the money raised by the SGA.

"It should be no problem," Cevallos said.

Howe also said a group of students that wanted to start a PondWatch group had received $750 from the SGA to spend on flashlights and two-way radios for volunteers who would both patrol the pond area and be available as escorts. The SGA would also be hearing a motion that would call for professors to offer academic clemency for students who miss classes. The SGA administration has also been meeting with the University administration daily.

"And that is just the official, once per day meeting that we've been having since Sunday," Avakian said. "We've been in constant contact with the trustees, as well as our unofficial meetings with members of the administration."

Howe expressed frustration that, as a body, the SGA has hit a wall when it comes to suspects, but that it would have to put its faith in the UMPD.

O'Connor said detectives were working every day on the assaults, combing through tips and information that comes in. She said that the investigations are slow and methodical, but that the community could be assured that the UMPD was working on it.

Meanwhile, aside from matching the funds that the here for a half hour or walk home?"

Her friend was not the only one who has had problems with the campus escort service. This past Tuesday, she called the Escort Service herself after her 5:30 p.m. class was finished to test the system, and to her shock, the same answer was given. She was informed about an extra van that was running, but they still said there was a wait.

"I thought the whole idea of the service was to promote safety," she said. "Our parents think we're safe, and maybe they do have another van, but what good are two vans going to do with the 20,000 people that attend this university? Things are just going to go back to normal again after this is over, you watch."

Violence against women was her main concern, for both her friends and herself. She said she never felt unsafe on the campus before, and would often make nightly trips across campus to the library. Feeling unsafe was a thought that never crossed her mind. She now fears that she can no longer be safe during daylight on her own campus, a thought, which shattered her campus pride.

"I thought nothing of it. Maybe you could say I'm innocent, but it did not make me nervous," she said. "As soon as I heard about the rape during the day, I thought there could have never been another rape at this hour. I think it's awful that people have to be scared during the day now. This is our campus, and when I walk to class, it should not require me to walk in groups. That's ridiculous."

She explained the need for personal safety, which she and her friends are practicing. Most of them are purchasing whistles, flashlights, key chain alarms and pepper spray, which they carry to class now.

"I know I'm going to get all this stuff too, but I just can't believe that I have to carry pepper spray around with me on my own campus during the day. It's sad," she said.

Another disturbing event for this student was a phone call she had received form her friends at a nearby college in New Hampshire. Her female friend was just leaving one of her guy friend's rooms at midnight and she became concerned, flashing back to our own campus attacks.

"I said to him, 'isn't anybody going to walk her home?' And he said: 'This isn't UMass, you know.'"

A growing concern for her however, is her view of men on campus. She said she still fells comfortable with her male friends, but other men on campus, who are not her friends, are a problem. She looks at men differently now and often glances behind her shoulder twice to see who is around her.

"Girls look at men differently now. I know I do," she said. "Guys say that we are not being fair, but you have to think about where we are coming from. They have to understand that girls are scared and uncomfortable, and I walk around campus looking at guys, thinking, 'oh my god, could he be one of them?' But it's only natural for us to think that everyone could be the rapist."

She said she was disturbed by the number of girls who still think that they are invincible, and that an assault would never happen to them. Her brother is 5-foot-11 and 16 years old, and even he is too much for her to handle.

"I can't believe some of these girls. They say it won't happen to them and they can kick his ass, but, well, the fact is you're not going to," she said. "My own brother is 16 years old and he's not that big. But I know that when he grabs me from behind and puts my arms in a lock, I can't get out. And he's just 16! Honestly, these people are just stupid, ignorant and immature, and they don't understand that it could happen to them."

She also questioned the police and what their priorities were on this campus. She felt that the police need to prioritize, and that they should be out looking instead of writing up tickets in parking lots or pulling people over for speeding. She insisted that this was not really necessary right now when all these crimes are far more important.

"I realize that there cannot be a police officer at every inch of this campus every hour of the day, and this is a big campus, that's the bottom line," she said. "But instead of them handing out tickets, they should be going through the lots and watch out for students instead. I'm not a cop, but I don't know what they are thinking right now with all of this. They worry about things more than they should. Their main concern should not be tickets, but safety. Everybody has to realize what is really important here."

She could not offer a solution regarding finding the suspects, but she did stress the importance of a routine plan every day.

"Everyone should come up with your own individual plan of how you will get to class, come back and not be by yourself. It may not help the victims, but it will prevent another attack form happening," she said. "These rapists and attackers like the idea of being in control, and they want everyone to know that. They find pleasure in this. We all need to take control and prioritize our lives."

College women outnumber men

By Amy Argetsinger
Washington Post

At a time when women are making tremendous gains in higher education, finding more support and earning more advanced diplomas than ever, a troubling phenomenon is occurring on college campuses across the country: The men are vanishing.

An Iowa-based policy analyst is highlighting the trend, which flips the age-old gender gap in higher education. Thomas G. Mortenson told a gathering of regional college presidents and deans at Goucher College on Tuesday that he believes it signals deeper problems in society.

"There is an absolute revolution going on in terms of college participation," he said. "Women are succeeding, and men are failing."

Mortenson's research shows that although men earned nearly 57 percent of the four-year degrees awarded at U.S. institutions in 1970, women were claiming more than 55 percent by 1986. He argued that the declining presence of men on increasingly female-dominated campuses may indicate greater ills, from the loss of male role models for boys to worldwide changes in the workplace.

The consequences, he argued, could be dire for men, because college degree-holders typically earn far more than high school graduates do.

Mortenson said that many educators have ignored the trend, which he is crusading to publicize, and that he has been "brushed off" by women's organizations. Yet his ideas seem to be gaining some traction, judging by the response he received at Tuesday's symposium, which the Towson, Md., institution organized around his findings.

Judy Jolley Mohraz, president of Goucher, formerly an all-women's college, said the issue is important to her school – where the student body is only one-third male after 15 years of coeducation – and to all liberal arts colleges interested in the question of "how we can educate young men and women together."

Locally, many campuses reflect the trends highlighted by Mortenson. At George Mason University in Fairfax County, Va., and George Washington University in Washington, 55 percent of the undergraduates are women. The University of Maryland at College Park bucks the trend, with roughly as many men as women receiving bachelor's degrees. Yet at Bowie State, Md., nearly twice as many women as men receive diplomas.

Mortenson's theories received some support from two Harvard psychologists who also spoke at the symposium. Daniel J. Kindlon, an expert on child development, said many boys start to fall behind in elementary school, where "impulse control" problems may get them branded as troublemakers, and they have few male teachers as role models.

"You put boys in that environment, where girls are at an advantage in maturation and have more role models. They look around and say, 'This game is fixed!'"

Psychiatrists examine tattoos

By Peter Jensen
Baltimore Sun

When prosecutors wanted a jury to understand what was going on inside the mind of Lawrence Russell Brewer Jr. when he dragged a black man to death near Jasper, Texas, they pointed to the outside of his body.

Jurors saw color slides of Brewer's extensive array of tattoos which included a pentagram, a burning cross, a swastika, the words, "death before dishonor," and the symbol of a racist prison gang affiliated with the KKK.

Defense attorneys scoffed that any conclusions could be drawn from such an exercise, pointing out that a tattoo drawn on Brewer's chest was the image of a female family friend he knew from church.

But prosecutors told jurors the tattoos were evidence of the depth of Brewer's white-supremacist convictions.

"It's one thing to say white supremacist words. It's another to belong to a white supremacist gang. It's one step further when you tattoo that message on your body. That's permanent," Jasper County District Attorney Guy James Gray told reporters during the September trial.

Brewer was convicted of his crime and sentenced to death. But the prosecutorial strategy raises a more basic question: What can tattoos tell us about the personality of the person underneath?

It's an idea that has not been widely studied. Traditional psychotherapists would not routinely ask a patient about the tattoos on his body, any more than they would ask than about facial hair or shoe size. But recently, some psychiatrists have been looking more closely at what one calls the potential for "dermal diagnosis."

Dr. William Cardasis, a criminal psychiatrist in Michigan, last month presented research at a psychiatric conference in Baltimore suggesting a link between tattoos and the diagnosis of anti-social personality disorder.

That's the fancy term for a sociopath – someone who has no regard for the rights of others, who lies, steals, is impulsive, frequently runs afoul of the law, but suffers little or no remorse.

Cardasis, the study's lead investigator, found that among 55 patients at the maximum-security forensic hospital in Ann Arbor, the likelihood of a diagnosis of anti-social personality disorder was far greater among patients with tattoos.

"The tattoos aren't making a diagnosis for you, but it was a strong indicator in this population," says Cardasis, who presented his findings at the annual meeting of the American Academy of Psychiatry and the Law.

Patients at a forensic hospital are hardly average citizens. They are usually criminal defendants whose sanity has been called into question. Typically, they were judged not guilty by reason of insanity or incompetent to stand trial.

In other words, the presence of a tattoo on an average man's forearm doesn't necessarily mean the bearer is bad to the bone. (A good thing, too, since an estimated 1 in 10 Americans has a tattoo.) But Cardasis says his research does suggest that psychiatrists should be paying more attention to what a patient's skin is telling them.

SGA has raised. Cevallos said he was expecting a shipment of whistles and shriek alarms to arrive on campus tomorrow. The administration is also fielding calls from concerned parents.

"We are telling those parents the same things that we have been telling this campus," Cevallos said. "We are telling them the steps that we are taking for security, and we are asking that parents convey to their daughters that they need to be aware of their surroundings."

Cevallos said that the community was doing its best to work together to combat the assaults that have occurred over the past 15 days. Luippold concurred, saying that the University was working together to assist during the investigation.

"We're all trying to maintain a sense of campus safety," Luippold said.

For their part, the UMPD has increased the number of patrols that are out and have begun working closely with both the Amherst Police Department and State Police officers from Northampton's B Troop.

"We have a combination of officers that are being offered overtime on their days off or the shifts that they aren't scheduled to be working, as well as security officers who are working overtime," O'Connor said.

Luippold stressed that the community truly needed to come together to be the eyes and ears of the campus.

Editorial/Opinion

The great invention

Now lets start off with a basic fact. When I say the word TAU, I don't mean your Touchy Alcoholic Uncle, or Tom Arnold's Urinal, or even that great American play, Twelve Angry Unitarians. I am talking about the Terminal Adapter Unit which UMass has so generously made those without Ethernet have to pay for, thus enabling them to hook up to the Internet, and at the same time, experience crazy fits of rage.

If at the beginning of the semester you found yourself living in the Sylvan Residential Paradise and Day Spa as I did, you must have realized that Heaven was not smiling down upon you. If that alone was not bad enough, to my knowledge residents in Cashin and MacNamara are the only students left on campus who are blessed with having to use a TAU. Even Northeast had Ethernet installed before the beginning of the semester, as did Brown, one of the three Sylvan residence halls. So if you are truly one of the forgotten few that happens to live in Cashin or MacNamara, my prayers are with you today.

David Groeger

Anyhow, the bottom line is that if you are a resident in Cashin or MacNamara you need a TAU. So you trek all the way down to Whitmore, a nice convenient location, to pick one up. While purchasing your TAU, you are informed that you and your roommate can only have one between the two of you. So basically only one TAU is allowed per room, meaning that unlike the rest of the civilized college world, you and your roommate can't both be on at the same time. (Be sure that by this point, my transfer papers were already processing.)

I still don't understand why you can't have more than one TAU per room, besides the fact that the lovely wall unit only has one jack for a telephone cord, while having enough Ethernet jacks to convenience the Tennessee militia. Which again, is quite useful in an area where Ethernet is a far-fetched dream that rates up there with decent parking availability in Orchard Hill. Not going to happen!

And it's not like there is such an overwhelming demand for these things that we can't afford to give one to each person. With a total of about 28 people in Sylvan who use them, I'm sure there are plenty to go around. Oh just listen to me, could I be more selfish? There are children starving in China without the use of even a single TAU and I want two. Please forgive my silliness.

Alright, so now you have the TAU, and all you have to do is go through a few easy steps to hook it up. Easy that is, if you are a neurosurgeon. After reading TAU's for Dummies and having an extensive conversation with Bill Gates, I was still no better off than when I started. The TAU User's Guide merely describes getting the TAU hooked up as a few simple steps of plugging in wires. However, I found myself doing much more than that. After having to install an entirely new modem, I was overwhelmed by the amount of programming numbers that made absolutely no sense. I didn't know why I was putting them into my computer, nor did I know if I would ever be able to find them again. The process was something like as follows:

Step 1: Primary DNS numbers (Use Psychic Friends Hotline) + Primary WINS numbers + Social Security Number + the pound key + the question mark symbol + the code to Mike Tyson's Punch Out.

Step 2: Once installation is complete, it is suggested that you give the TAU 5-7 days for a religious observance to occur and a miracle to happen.

Alright, so you're hooked up, you're plugged in, and you're ready to surf the proverbial web. However, now you notice another potential problem. Depending on what time of day it is, your TAU may or may not connect you. More specifically, if it is not in the hours of 3am-4am, there is a good chance that you may not be connected. The trick to knowing if you are going to be connected is to decipher a series of blinking lights located on your TAU. If the middle and top lights are blinking, then you will be connected, but if the middle and bottom lights are blinking, you will not be connected (See Step 2). However, if your top and bottom lights are blinking it means that your pizza is here, and if only the middle light is blinking, proceed in fire-drill fashion down the stairwell to the nearest open area.

Another problem with the TAU is that no matter where you are or what you are doing, there is a very good chance that you will be randomly disconnected after two and half hours. This can pose some very frustrating situations.

Alien01: We have been sent here from the planet Zotac to give you necessary cures and vaccines for deadly diseases that currently afflict earthlings.

EarthRep: Thank you my friendly neighbor. We are much in your debt. We will be able to increase our quality of life to a level that we have only dreamed of.

Alien01: As long as communications are good, we can rule this galaxy together! Hello? Hello?

(The Internet user EarthRep is not currently logged on)

Alien01: Very well. Insult me, will you? Destroy the fetal planet!

This of course is an extreme circumstance, but you get the point.

The TAU has been the source of many, many problems. There have been numerous complaints from Sylvan, many phone calls from Northeast, and the rise of Communism in small Third World countries.

I have three pieces of advice for everyone out there who may be using a TAU. First of all, don't get frustrated. That only makes the TAU goblins laugh at you. Secondly, pray each and every night that if you are good, the Ethernet fairy will come and leave a surprise under your pillow the next morning. But on a serious note and in fact most important of all... The Internet user David Groeger has been disconnected.

David Groeger is a UMass student.

I've got the varsity blues

After three and a half years of hard work and deep thoughts at UMass, I have finally decided what I want to do with the rest of my life. Some might say it's about time I get my act in gear, while others could contest that I have always had a plan of action. In any case, throw any contradiction aside for I have found my calling.

I want to be a high school junior varsity field hockey coach.

Now hear me out.

Kathleen Ralls

Starting off as an English major, I never thought I would be a novelist or publisher, but I despised math so much that I opted for its furthest adversary. Yet after one year of critically thinking about nature and abstract ideas in which personally, I would rather remain in awe and slight admiration, I delved into the journalism department with a bit more vigor. Sports-journalism is my calling. I told myself. Watching games, talking to athletes, indulging myself in all that the Daily Collegian has to offer: that is what my talents are meant for, I figured.

But strange opportunities can come about when you least expect them. That's what happened to me last spring, when a random meeting earned me the job of being the JV field hockey coach over at Amherst Regional High School. With some coaching experience under my belt, I thought I would be perfect for the description: I love field hockey and I love working with people, especially kids. Moreover, there's big bucks in high school coaching, trust me on this one!

At the start of the season, I had my doubts about whether I was cut out for the job. I have a tendency to say as little as possible at times, and let us just say I sometimes have a voice that struggles to carry over the mewing of a 2-week-old kitten. Not good.

Yet, my team and I had a little discussion during our first weekend practice (you thought I would give them two days off?) and our bond began to grow. In fact, I would like to think I taught them a few things about the game of field hockey and how to get away with obstructing a goalie during Rapid Fire drills. My 16 girls also taught me a few things about them and life throughout the season as well.

Lesson #1. Nature is everyone's bathroom, changing room, etc... I admit I was a stickler about not allowing everyone to run to the bathroom the minute we got off the bus for an away game. Surprisingly enough, I did not know where the bathroom was in any away school we played. Admittedly, I had never been to any of the schools we played against and I guess I should have scouted out such things the night before. I apologize for any inconveniences I might have caused.

Nevertheless, my team made the best of it with numerous escapades into the woods. I was proud of my team by the end of the season as they robustly raced for the trees as soon as we got off the bus, as though it was a part of our warm-up.

Lesson #2. Pink pompoms are cool. While it is not acceptable to wear pajamas or blue eye shadow for many of us, pink pompoms on major game days is a perfectly logical way to remind yourself of your afternoon game. Sticks, mouthguards, hacking... pompoms? Of course!

Lesson #3. Chuck the chicken. Who knew that all my team really wanted to do was throw the ball as far as they could and run around in a rapid Mother Goose fashion while the other half chased after the ball. Pacer chaser and suicides? They just were not creative enough for my fun-loving team. Who is the fastest team in the league now!

Lesson #4. How to be ready for a 7:10 p.m. movie when you are still on the bus and it's 6:39 p.m. While I had plans of Antonio's and a couple hours of SportsCenter before I headed out for the night, these girls' weekends hinged on what time the speedy wheels of the trusty transportation rolled into the high school parking lot. Comments like "He's not going to be there?" and "Whose mother is going to pick us up?" are the important questions to be answered fresh after a win. My girls know how to lead a well-balanced life.

Lesson #5. "Hurricanes Huhh! Huhh!" Need I say more? Personally, it came in handy when I could not stay awake anymore to study for an early exam. When we were tied late in the game or needed to maintain momentum, we chanted this boost to out-psyche opposing teams or the varsity team in inter-squad scrimmages. P.S. You'll get 'em next year girls. Alternatively, you'll become THEM.

Lesson #6. Male fans are the best kind of fans. Not that we discriminated against all those faithful moms, nor was it true that dads held any advantage over mothers, but you know what I am saying. Whether they were freshmen checking out their first field hockey game or college juniors attending just to pass the afternoon, we loved every single one of them.

Of course, there are many other lessons I picked up from our time together, but that would be considered a breach of trust. So maybe my parents will not be too thrilled with my new line of work. Yes, when I say junior varsity, I mean junior varsity. I do not think I want the kind of pressure a varsity position can bring, not to mention the major league-size egos! Maybe we didn't have a post-season, but I just like knowing that someday each of my kids will get there and remember the good ol' days on JV like I will.

Highway to hell

You are weak. You are a coward. You are pathetic. You are an insecure wimp. You've proven this by attacking innocent women who were walking alone. You feel no satisfaction in the person you are. Because of this, you choose to overpower women who are physically smaller and weaker than you. I am here to warn you. I am using my weekly forum to tell you that we will not stand for this.

There are two groups on this campus. One group is made up of about 29,997 students, professors and university workers. 29,997 people who have been burned and are not willing to be burned again. This group has been forced to endure weeks of violence in its own backyard. We will not tolerate this anymore. Yes, we have failed. Any time a violent crime occurs on our campus we have failed. In this case we have failed miserably. However, now is the time. Now is the time for UMass to stop looking the other way when messed up stuff happens here. Now is the time to look this problem right in the eye, grab it by the throat and choke it until it is lying lifeless on the ground. I don't know what the solution is. Maybe it is more cops, more lights, more call boxes or maybe it is more attentive students walking around campus. Whatever the solution is, this rash of horrific acts will come to an end. Whoever you are that is doing this, you'd better hope that the police find you before a lynch mob of students does. From talking to many students on campus, it seems that for each one of you that is found committing an act of violence, there will be two less testicles in the world.

Dan Viens

As for this group of you that has most of our campus in an uproar, you are going to hell. I don't know if the rumors are true about you being in some secret testosterone-driven UMass club that is out to hurt as many women as you can before the millennium, but either way you're going to hell. Anyone who walks around in broad daylight just trying to hurt girls is a weak bastard.

What do you say to your mother when you talk to her on the phone? How can you even talk to her? The next time you are plotting an attack or actually harming someone, stop to think about your mother. She is probably at home getting excited for her dashing (well, maybe not so dashing; I saw your sketch) young son to come home for Thanksgiving. She has visions of you studying away and spending time on our rustic campus. However, all you're really doing is beating up women. I'm sure she would be quite proud. Whatever you may think and whatever anyone else on campus may think, you are a weak loser and you're going to hell.

This is not how life should be lived. We should not have to walk around this campus living in fear. However, bad things do happen. You insecure boys have decided that it's cool to attack your neighbors, and in turn cause everyone to be suspicious of everyone else. There is no solution, but there are obviously precautions that can be taken. It is a nice symbolic gesture for the cops to sit all around campus (plus there seem to have been a lot less parking tickets.) I guess a couple more call boxes or lights would be nice, but there is no way to end all of this. All we can really do is be prepared. If you are attacked, be ready to act. If you see an attack, act fast.

As for some ways that you can be prepared, you may want to carry mace. However, there is a problem with mace. The person who is sprayed with this can run away with no long-term damage.

Seriously though, be careful. Let's do our best to turn this campus back into a place where you can sleep wherever you please. As for the assailants, you should be proud that you have found a quick and easy way to get into hell.

THE SOURCE

Another Fine Product of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian — Every Thursday!

A reckless weekend is on tap in Bowker while the Ballroom is filled with symbols of winter, the 'box shines bright and Pearl Street gives out doses of free beer.

Last year it was the little tour that could, but for Voices on the Verge's second time around, it's the hot ticket that is quickly selling out. The original tour's success is based on an intelligent marketing strategy that combines four talented emerging female songwriters based in different parts of the country on one bill. By greatly expanding each of the women's fanbase, they have now returned to headline many of the venues that they first played as a group. Luckily, Jess Klein, Rose Polenzani, Erin McKeown and Beth Amsel team up for most likely one final round. Forget Dylan playing a large venue, and see blossoming talent in one of the two intimate performances that are held at the Horse tonight.

Northampton based pop band Yanni Difranco played the CMJ Music Conference in New York City in September and since then they have been receiving a great amount of press. The band plays the Bay State. Last time Live came around they hit the uncomfortable Mullins Center, tonight they play the cozy Orpheum in Boston. Deep Banana Blackout looks to stir up the smoke at Pearl Street with their funky jamband beats with Free Beer & Chicken opening.

Rane who recently orchestrated a dazzling set at the opening night of The Skybox perform in a special acoustic set at Fire & Water Cafe. Speaking of the Box, head to Sensual Thursdays with DJ Wal-Gee spinning hip-hop and reggae starting at 9 p.m. Look for Chubby-Chub at the club the week after Thanksgiving.

Opening tonight at Bowker, the UMass Theater Guild presents Reckless until Saturday. Also, if you are looking for unbeatable deals on winter apparel, ski and snowboard gear head to the annual Great UMass Ski 'n' Board Sale beginning today at noon until 8 p.m. It'will run also through Saturday. Look for free lift tickets, t-shirts, and plenty of other goodies.

The Boston based Fly Seville is at the Flywheel on Friday, while the Stone Coyotes, recently the subject of an upcoming book and movie are at the Northampton's Bay State. Men's Hockey faces off against UConn at the M.

The cross-state rivalry continues on Saturday when UMass Football hosts UConn at McGuirk Stadium with a half-past noon kickoff. Comedy and improv invade Herter that night when Mission Improvable invites TheaterSports Boston and Sitcom Boston to the campus.

The week winds down heading closer to Thanksgiving recess with Medeski, Martin & Wood soothing people at the Calvin on Monday. Men's Hockey closes the week on Tuesday.

Stomp romps on with high energy

From sets to risky moves, production rocks

By Kristi Ceccarossi
Collegian Staff

STOMP
Directed by Luke Cresswell and Steve McNicholas
Concert Hall, November 16

A couple of years ago, Broadway introduced a group of shows that broke down aged conventions of musical theatre and finally appealed to a generation that was almost completely disinterested in the art form. These productions, namely Rent, Blue Man Group, Bring in Da Noise/Bring in Da Funk, Tap Dogs, and Stomp, basically revived the commercial investment in musical theatre and got a huge population of the 12-20 year olds involved. Using elements of contemporary music, youthful vernacular, little or no plot structure, trendy costumes, and really attractive young actors, these shows swept the Tonys in 1996 and have maintained a strong following since. With credit handed entirely to them, theatrical traditions are being tossed out the window and a new aged performance is taking enlarged stage.

Answering this popularity and demand, the Fine Arts Center brought Stomp to the Concert Hall this week. Unlike the shows released contemporaneously with it, Stomp doesn't feature any singing or dialogue, and makes no effort to create a consistent story. Instead, it's a celebration of percussion and the human body. Using various street items made of plastic, rubber, wood or metal, a cast of eight performs man made, tribal rhythms for 90 minutes.

The most impressive aspect of this production is the energy and focus of the performers. From start to finish they are completely involved in a show that requires a tremendous amount of physical strain. They carry around large props to make music, including sinks and trash cans, and are constantly moving and keeping time with them. While using long metal rods or wooden sticks, the cast follows a frantic choreography, without flaw, illustrating an exceptional sense of timing and concentration. Several of their larger numbers are easily risking serious injury, but they completed each of them with a confidence and agility that made the end result even more fulfilling.

There is no denying the fact that Stomp is an entirely unique experience. Part of that novelty that attracts so many young people in particular, is the appearance of the show. The set recalls New York's 14th Street with its deliberately polluted and industrial look. Strewn all over the unit piece are a variety of pots and pans, signs, pails—anything the performers can use to drum on. The actors maintain that hip-because-I'm-young-and-poor appeal, too, with their dirtied street clothes costumes and club kid haircuts. Although none of this décor is necessary, because the show is only an expression of percussion, it works. The coolness draws you in, and makes you enjoy what they're doing so much more.

The highlight of the evening naturally came toward the end of the show. The stage became almost chaotic as the cast was doing so many different things that you could scarcely recognize who was playing what pieces when. Accompanied by all the proper lighting tricks, four members of the ensemble were attached to the high wall of the set piece by a bungee chord. While hanging from there they pounded out the most powerful sounds of the show, swinging back and forth between all of the different "instruments" placed on the wall. While this was happening the rest of the cast was taking turns running to and from the other stationary pieces, holding up the backbeat. They managed to create that feeling of greatness only five performances can: that certain something that eludes reasoning and speaks directly to our primitive senses of rhythm and the emotion transferred from them.

Considering the goals Stomp set for itself, this production reached them flawlessly. But the very thing that makes this show unlike anything else is what makes it tedious. Sure, it's really interesting to see how a bunch of people can make a song out of sweeping, or newspapers, or cigarette lighters, but after a while the newness wears off and something different and tangible is desired. Unless you're a die hard fan of drum corps, you're probably going to get a little tired of the show, even if you don't want to admit it because you paid so much for your tickets. But the designers of Stomp and certainly the cast that presented it to us at the FAC deserve applause for their contribution to the restoration of the theatre, and their outstanding dedication to a very modern concept. Any form of live performance can be stirring, even one that grows monotonous after a while. Stomp was undoubtedly no exception.

don't, then I'll help. Also, I'll put in various parenthetical explanations for those who are familiar with M: TG. (And, I know you're out there.)

First, let's go over the basic anatomy of a basic Pokémon card (M: TG players: these are essentially just creatures with no casting cost). Each Pokémon has a name, a type, hit points, attack cost, retreat cost, weakness if any, resistance if any, rarity, and any special powers. Pokémon cards have six types (opposed to M: TG's five): grass, fire, water, lightning, psychic, fighting. Pokémon also has a colorless, like Magic. These card types correspond to the energy needed to use them: much the same as the colors in Magic correspond to the "mana" needed to cast them. A Pokémon's hit points (toughness) are how much damage it can take before it dies. Its attack damage (power) is how much damage it can inflict on an opponent's Pokémon. Attack cost is how much energy (mana) you need to attach to the Pokémon before it can attack. Resistance is protection from certain Pokémon types (imagine protection from a certain color as only half protection). Weakness is simply the inverse of the above.

If you've got that, then the game itself is relatively easy. Other than basic Pokémon cards there are Energy cards, trainers, and evolution cards. As I said, Energy is like mana; trainers are cards with one-time effects (basically instant without the whole LIFO theory). (Also, from what I gather, there are no interrupts in Pokémon.) Evolution cards are played on Pokémon to enhance their abilities (enchantments).

Each player shuffles and draws 7 cards. If other player draws no basic Pokémon cards, then they must reshuffle with the penalty that their opponent draws two additional cards for every time that this happens. Each player then chooses one active Pokémon and puts it into play (there is never any casting cost in Pokémon). Any other Pokémon may also be put into play, but in the player's "bench." The "bench" is in play, but the cards here are placed faced down. Each player then puts the top six cards of their deck aside as "prizes," which are drawn upon killing an opponent's active Pokémon.

On any particular turn, a player can do a number of things. Player's can play Energy cards—as many as they'd like. However, a player may only attach energy to a Pokémon once per turn. A player can evolve a Pokémon. A player is also allowed to attack once per turn with their active Pokémon, provided the required attack cost is paid.

Any damage done by a Pokémon attack is dealt directly to your opponent's active Pokémon (your object is to kill opponent's Pokémons as opposed to killing your opponent in Magic). You win in one of three ways: by killing six of your opponent's Pokémon, thereby claiming your six prizes, if your opponent runs out of cards, or if kill your opponent's Pokémon and they have no Pokémon on their bench with which to replace it. This should be enough to get you started, but read below for some of the more intricate details and rules.

Each Pokémon has the ability to retreat, that is, switch places with a Pokémon on the bench, though there is usually a cost attached. This ability is designed to prevent Pokémon cards from dying quickly. (As a side note, you can still attack the same turn as you retreat.) Weakness from a type of Pokémon means damage done to the Pokémon by that type is doubled. Certain Pokémon have additional abilities beyond the power to inflict pain. These are detailed here:

Asleep: A Pokémon cannot attack. After every turn, flip a coin to determine whether the Pokémon wakes up or not.

Confused: The Pokémon can attack as normal if a coin-flip turns up heads. If the flip winds up tails, then the Pokémon cannot attack and does 20 damage to itself.

Paralyzed: The Pokémon cannot attack or retreat, but recovers after its owner's next turn.

Poisoned: A Pokémon takes a certain amount of damage after each turn.

That's about all. If you understand these rules and watch a few games beforehand, then you should be ready to enter into the world of Pokémon: The Card Game. Right now players have three sets from which to build their decks: a base set, a jungle expansion set, and a fossil expansion. But, with the ever-increasing popularity of Pokémon and the enormous success of the movie, then you can be sure Wizards will be releasing more cards very soon.

■ Pokémon

keeps releasing more cards, which they will obviously do (just look to Magic for proof), then little kids will have to continue buying cards. Exploitation, anyone? Likewise, the Pokémon gamepacks from Gameboy come in various colors, including blue, red, gold, and silver, for this same reason.

Anyway, back to the evolution of Pokémon. After the aforementioned video games, they decided it was so popular that they would make an Anime out of it. Yup, that was the seizure causing one. The story revolves around Ash Ketchum, whose only desire in life is to become the so-called "Pokémon Master" (exploitation, exploitation), so he can enter the Pokémon League. His arch nemesis is the evil Gary Oak, while his two friends are Misty and Brock. Of course, there's always Team Rocket out to steal his Pikachu.

As I said previously, an idea like Pokémon translates brilliantly to capitalism. Fade out Japan, fade in good old U.S. to run the cartoon show. Let a good gaming company develop a generic strategy game using it as an emblem. Market the hell out of it. Release a critically massacred movie on 5000 plus screens, tack on a soundtrack full of bland grinding pop music, and watch the money roll in (exploitation). Add comic books and full-length novels (thereby lowering the term to an all-time low). Children's software, toys from Hasbro, and gamepacks are all part of the well-oiled money-making machine.

The worst part is that parents condone it all. After all, it's only a cartoon, how harmful could it be? Well, once they start shelling out inordinately large sums of money to satisfy their kids' Pokémon habit, then maybe they'll realize: Pokémon equals green, not yellow.

Guild presents Reckless

By Kristi Ceccarossi
Collegian Staff

The Theatre Guild opens its first full-length production of this semester this weekend with Craig Lucas' Reckless. This play is a venture from previous Guild shows; while the group has presented works that are clearly tragedies and others that are clearly comedies, this is the first time they've worked with both elements so closely intertwined.

It would be difficult to find a play with which to compare Reckless. It's just as difficult to provide a completely linear plot summary. In the briefest of terms, it's about a woman named Rachel (played by Jen Bean) who is told by her husband (Mike Dvan) on Christmas Eve that he's taken a contract out on her life. But at the last minute he decides he doesn't want to go through with it and tells her to run away, to stay alive. What happens next are a series of unbelievably coincidental events that flow so well that it's easy to excuse their exaggerated nature. The play has a lovely totality that hringe everything together in a very Seinfeld way. It's basically a story about how, as Rachel says, "things just happen" and the sometimes-oblique ways we have to deal with them.

Matthew Cavanaugh is directing the production, marking his first artistic design of a Guild show. Last year he produced both You Can Take it With You and Suburbia for the group. Despite the complexity of a script like Reckless, he found that the most challenging aspect of his job involved more of the technical aspects of the production, as the play calls for innumerable set and lighting changes. The size of the cast (seven), he said, was small enough to create a fluid unity, and a focused set of talented individuals.

Producing the script, Craig Luca includes a few lines from W H Auden's poem Leap Before You Look: "A solitude ten thousand fathoms deep / Sustains the bed on which we lie, my dear./ Although I love you, you will have to leap." Our dream of safety has to disappear. These words accurately give a sense of what Reckless tries to address for a uniquely poignant and sincerely funny night of theatre, stop by Bowker Auditorium some time this weekend. Performances start Thursday night and run through Saturday at 8pm, with an additional matinee on Saturday at 2pm. Tickets are $5 for students and $8 for the general public. They can be reserved by phone at 545.2511 or purchased at the door.

Greedy millionaires run TV as "Millionaire" scores big

Who wants to be a greedy millionaire? Apparently, everyone who owns a TV. The past two weeks, television has been dominated by the tabloid quiz shows that offer contestants a chance to earn enough money to take quite a bit of time off from work. "Who Wants to be a Millionaire" returned last week after showing huge ratings during the summer. However, the eagerly awaiting audience has choices to make: "Who Wants to be a Millionaire" now has a mortal enemy, FOX's "Greed" is trying to cash in on the same viewers as "Who Wants to be a Millionaire" did this summer, and is doing quite a good job.

To compare the two shows is ridiculous. The bottom line is that both shows are ridiculous anyway, but the numbers that they're producing certainly show otherwise. Out of the top 20 shows compiled by the Neilson ratings for the week of November 8th to November 14th, "Who Wants to be a Millionaire" held seven of the spots. The ratings are through the roof for both shows, and are causing viewers to change what they're used to watching.

For instance, because of "Who Wants to be a Millionaire" and "Greed," NBC has taken a big dive in the Thursday night ratings. Every week, the top rated show is always "ER," and this week was no exception. Also, "Friends" remained in the top five, but dropped two notches from its normal number two ranking to number four. On any given week during the TV season, NBC usually has all five of their Thursday night prime time shows in the top twenty, and "Frasier" has been in the top ten all year. Last week, NBC only had two shows in the top twenty, ("ER" and "Friends") with "Frasier," "Jesse," and "Stark Raving Mad," all being bumped from the list.

Where did all the viewers go? Well, on Thursday night, an estimated 14.3 million people were tuned into ABC, watching "Who Wants to be a Millionaire." Since "Greed" is only on once a week, it nets FOX big numbers, but not big enough to be in the top 20. Granted, it did score higher than both "Jesse" and "Stark Raving Mad." It's clear that during this November sweeps period, NBC is going to turn out to be a big loser.

The top rated episode of "Who Wants to be a Millionaire" was Sunday night. Its only competitors were NBC's movie "Mary: Mother of Jesus," and CBS' "60 Minutes." Both of these shows tied for number 20. "60 Minutes" was ranked 6th the week before.

So with all of the game show craze, which one is actually a better show? The numbers prove that more people are watching "Who Wants to be a Millionaire" than anything else on TV, but I think that "Greed" is much better. In this show, hosted by Chuck Woolery, the jackpot is much higher (it's up around 2.1 million dollars now) and it's much more fun. The premise of "Greed" is that a group of people works as a team to try and win money, while at the same time they are pitted against one another. You can't win money in "Greed" without trusting everyone that you're working with, but you also have many opportunities to eliminate the rest of your team to take home more money than anyone else. Also, someone has already won a million dollars on "Greed," which is a feat that has yet to be achieved on "Who Wants to be a Millionaire." The main reason that more people are watching "Who Wants to be a Millionaire" is because it's on every night, and it is certainly the pioneer of its genre. When it premiered last summer, it was a unique idea that no one had ever seen before, and it consequently has become a TV sensation.

While the two game shows are dominating the world of TV, what are the other networks doing to try to keep up during sweeps? NBC sent Conan O' Brien to Los Angeles, and gave him terrific guests such as Ben Affleck and Lisa Kudrow. CBS has been hyping their upcoming movies like crazy, and had one at the beginning of the month about the origins of rock n' roll.

However, even though the other networks (including FOX) are trying hard to come up with a way to beat the game show craze, it's clear that "Who Wants to be a Millionaire" cannot be stopped. People are watching, and ABC is having its best ratings ever. It has even been reported that the prices for advertising during the game show are hitting Super Bowlesque costs. The idea of anything being compared to the amount of viewers that the Super Bowl draws is outrageous. It proves something that I've been advocating for a long time: no matter how ridiculous the idea, originality is what gains viewers. Even though people love to watch "ER" and "Friends," they will clearly abandon these things to watch something new and fresh. It would be interesting to see how "Who Wants to be a Millionaire" would do, if it were placed against "ER." Since television's top rated show airs at 10 pm on Thursday nights, "Who Wants to be a Millionaire" has already ended. The truth is that the game

Smith in new Willenium

By Richard Harrington
Washington Post

Actor-rapper Will Smith states his position early on "Willennium," the follow-up to 1997's multi-platinum "Big Willie Style." On "I'm Comin'," he raps that "an angel, my grandma, told me before she died/ smart folks don't need to put no cursin'/ in their rhymes/ so from CD to TV to movies back to rhymin'/ my life stats make Jordan's six straight seem common." It's a pride rap, and also a clean one, and Smith sticks to it over the course of 15 tracks. On "Da Butta," he even gets the normally foul-mouthed Lil' Kim to clean up her act. Of course, Smith's raps have been family- hour-oriented since he kicked off his career 12 years ago with DJ Jazzy Jeff on "Girls Ain't Nothing but Trouble" and "Parents Just Don't Understand."

COURTESY ARLENE GUE GORDON

Will Smith brings his clean, family friendly rap into the new Willenium.

Smith's not above defensiveness on "Freakin' It," he complains, "I been in Rap Pages, they referred to me as soft/ yeah, more like Microsoft," but most of his new album is about positivity, from the supportive affirmation of "Afro Angel" (written with wife Jada Pinkett) and "Potna," a testimonial to loyalty and friendships, to "Uuhhh," where he suggests "eclecticism is a virtue/ it may not be a word but its definitely a virtue."

So is familiarity with the samples that are at the root of many tracks. The millennium party jam "Will 2K" (featuring K-Ci Hailey) is built on the Clash's "Rock the Casbah," "Da Butta" on an LTD vamp. "Can I Feel Me?," Smith's collaboration with Eve, samples Michael Jackson's "Working Day and Night," while "Freakin' It" strip-mines two much-tapped sources, Diana Ross' "Love Hangover" and the Sugarhill Gang's "Rapper's Delight." The Stevie Wonder-reliant theme to "Wild Wild West" is included here, with a nod to the Latin market on "La Fiesta," which is as weak as Lou Bega's "Mambo No. 5" despite sampling Tito Puente up close and personal.

Smith's CV is revisited on "Who Am I?," a skittish Rodney Jerkins-produced track featuring former "Fresh Prince of Bel-Air" co-star Tatyana Ali and MC Lyte, and more tellingly, on several tracks with former partner Jazzy Jeff (who produced nine tracks overall). "So Fresh," featuring guests Biz Markie Attention upstanding citizens!!!

Be warned that a new form of radio -- digital crack is more like it -- is about to be unleashed upon an unsuspecting nation. Called Live365.com, it is nothing less than a plot to lure an entire generation of young hearts and minds into an incredibly hypnotic world of sonic addiction.
Once they've got us hooked, the powers-that-be will start pumping the happy juice into the water supply and using our fillings to manipulate our brain waves.

As this confidential document clearly shows, Live365.com's Internet radio scheme just may be the brainchild of the Freemasons (the government behind the government).

Ash Ketchum and his pals Misty and Brock.

The trio is among many who brave a dangerous storm that Mewtwo magically whips up to weed out the lesser trainers. Needless to say, Ash, Misty and Brock survive and meet the latter superpower on his fairly cliche island base, called, cleverly, New Island.

Mewtwo proceeds to capture all the trainers' Pokemon and clones them, allowing for the climactic, and the term is used loosely, battle between the real Pokemon and their evil clones.

At this point, the film has a distinct chance to salvage a certain level of credibility. Without being more than a longer version of the run-of-the-mill cartoon to this point, The First Movie hints at inserting an important moral message for the young children that it targets so fiercely.

As the creatures and their clones exhaust each other in a handful of nip-and-tuck fistfights, they and their human trainers come to the realization that it is wrong to fight simply because the animals are different – they "have so much in common", such as the universally-used and mundane sky and stars above. Disregarding the fact that this well-intentioned subliminal message is almost nullified by the fact that the Pokemon are fighting clones who are, in fact, not different in any way, it remains the saving grace of the movie for parents, hoping that their children learn more from their movie-going experience than how to catch pretend animals.

This fight on important issues, like prejudice and violence, is soon forgotten in the plot of the film, as Mewtwo and Mew make friends and evacuate with the clones, leaving Ash, his buddies and their Pokemon back where they began with no recollection of what transpired. This implies that they will continue to go on unchanged by the important lessons that were discussed earlier. In laymen's terms, the message is, "Don't fight people different than you... never mind, fighting is fun."

To add to the fact that the movie is playing to a near-captive audience, there is no redeeming value. Making matters worse, the soundtrack stoops to all-time superficial pop lows, boasting vapid chart-toppers like Christina Aguilera and Vitamin C, and genre-jumping musicians Blessed Union of Souls.

In conclusion, the film comes far from being an adequate children's movie and instead represents a pop culture masterpiece, exploiting commercial culture lucratively. D.

show has conquered pretty much everything else. The only show on TV that showed a rise in numbers during "Who Wants to be a Millionaire's" run was "Monday Night Football." The football game aired on ABC after "Who Wants to be a Millionaire," giving ABC a Monday night ratings lead that was out of this world.

Without being too critical of these shows, I think it's easy to say that their success will not last. However, that's the beauty of it. Since they're only on during sweeps period, we don't have to worry about getting sick of them. We know that they'll go away in due time, and perhaps when February sweeps arrives, we'll see more. If "Who Wants to be a Millionaire" wants to stay original, it's definitely going to have to increase the jackpot. If the show does come back, and that's inevitable, it's going to have to fight the fact that it will not give away the most money in TV history. Even though less people are watching it, "Greed" has already won that battle.

Whether you're a "Greed" fan, or would be willing to settle for a lowly million dollars, the truth is that you cannot avoid the game show craze. Both shows are proving that anything will be done to gain viewers. Personally, I'd pay to watch Regis and Chuck fight it out man to man in a steel cage on pay-per-view wrestling. My money's on Chuck.

and Slick Rick, is a celebration of hip-hop history and its Philadelphia roots, while "Pump Me Up" finds fazzy Jeff paying homage to the old-school masters with some spectacular turntable technique.

"Willennium" may not be "fresh," but it's accessible and entertaining, and Smith is a genial rapper with a strong, confident flow. But he's hardly the "hip-hop Moses" he posits himself to be, particularly after Hall of Shame lines like this from "No More," a catalogue of loss after a romantic transgression: "I can't hide on land, air or sea/ 'cause every time I turn around there I be/ when I was with you I felt free/ now I'm in a cage called me."

Landscape of college hoops going through changes

By Don Markus
The Baltimore Sun

DURHAM, N.C. - Shane Battier came to Duke two years ago as a member of college basketball's top-rated recruiting class. By the time he leaves, most likely after his senior year, his memories of playing with Elton Brand, William Avery and Chris Burgess will be distant - and a bit disappointing.

The disappointment doesn't come only in the fact that the Blue Devils fell short of their ultimate goal the past two years, losing to Kentucky in the NCAA tournament South Regional final when Battier and the others were freshmen, and falling to Connecticut in the tournament's championship game last season. It also comes from the departure of his former teammates last spring.

Brand and Avery left Duke for the NBA as first-round draft choices, as did freshman phenom Corey Maggette. Burgess, unhappy about his role the past two years as Brand's backup, left for the University of Utah. And Battier was left with an interesting perspective about a program that has been the most successful in college basketball for the past 15 years.

"College basketball is a very transitory sport right now," Battier said one afternoon last month, hours before the Blue Devils were to take the court at Cameron Indoor Stadium for Midnight Madness. "The Duke program of 1997 is not the same as the Duke program of 1999."

If there is any consolation for Battier, college basketball isn't what it used to be when Duke's dynasty - under Mike Krzyzewski - began with a trip to the Final Four in 1986, or what it was when the Blue Devils won back-to-back championships in 1991 and 1992. The sport is not even what it was when the program fell to the bottom of the Atlantic Coast Conference during Krzyzewski's absence for most of the 1994-95 season.

A number of factors have served to dilute the sport of its top stars: the growing number of players leaving for the NBA before their college eligibility is over and the increase in players, usually for academics or economics or both, who choose to go directly from high schools to the pros. The changing face of college basketball has more peach fuzz than stubble.

But Duke, which had never lost a player early to the NBA until this year, was certainly not alone.

Connecticut shooting guard and Final Four MVP Richard Hamilton left after three years in Storrs and became the top draft pick of the Washington Wizards. Maryland, which reached the Sweet 16, watched senior-to-be Steve Francis renounce his college eligibility after one year, as did Rhode Island's Lamar Odom. St. John's said goodbye to Ron Artest, after his sophomore year.

And then there was Mississippi State, which received an oral commitment from Jonathan Bender before the high school star opted for the NBA.

"I've never had one kid say to me, 'Coach, I'm going early,' when we're recruiting him," said Krzyzewski, now in his 20th season at Duke. "That's not to say they won't leave after a year or two. You've got to be good to be in that position. Hopefully we'll get more players like that and we'll ross that bridge when we come to it."

Rick Majerus has had less than a handful of players at Utah who find themselves contemplating that decision. Last spring, it was Hanno Mottola. The year before that it was Andre Miller. Before them it was Michael Doleac and Keith Van Horn. Each, for his own reason, stayed. Miller, Doleac and Van Horn all benefited, improving their games and their position in the draft, something Mottola hopes to do this season.

Not that Majerus would mind having a player good enough to make the jump after his sophomore year - and might when Britton Johnsen returns next season after a two-year Mormon mission.

"I'd rather have the talent once in a while and see how much fun it is," said Majerus, whose ties lost to Kentucky in the NCAA final two years ago with Doleac and Miller, then a fourth-year junior. "I'd like to lose a Richard Hamilton."

As a result of the defections, trying to put together an All-America team for this season is difficult. Among the players who returned for their senior years: Michigan State's Mateen Cleaves is out until early January with a stress fracture and North Carolina's Ed Cota is out indefinitely after being suspended Nov. 1 for his part in a bar brawl. They were considered the two top point guards in the country.

Among the teams given a legitimate chance to win a national championship, Cincinnati and Auburn will again rely heavily on former junior college transfers, while Florida is still in the midst of its youth movement under boy-wonder Coach Billy Donovan.

Another team considered among Final Four contenders, Ohio State, will be led by senior Scoonie Penn (who transferred two years ago) and junior Michael Redd.

"I think when you have experienced guys - like me and Michael, it gives you a big advantage - especially in the NCAA tournament," Penn said after the Buckeyes beat St. John's, with then-freshman point guard Frick Barkley in last season's South Regional final in Knoxville, Tenn.

Majerus remembers watching an NBA playoff game last spring.

"One of the announcers said that of the 16 rookies with playoff teams, 14 had stayed four years," Majerus said. "You can make a deal with the devil. You like Kevin Garnett has a nice life, he lives in a nice crib, but you miss out on a big part of your life. You lose the chance of being a captain, the maturity, the discovery of self."

Duke freshman Jason Williams is just beginning that process. Expected to start at point guard this season, Williams came to Duke mainly to play with Battier, a former AAU rival from the New York-New Jersey area, as well as with Avery and Maggette.

Now he is part of a freshman class that includes Michael Dunleavy - the son of Portland Trail Blazers Coach Mike Dunleavy - and Carlos Boozer. They too are expected to contribute right away. (Boozer suffered the same ligament tear Brand sustained as a freshman, but is expected to be ready shortly.)

"It was kind of hard when I found out Elton and those other guys were leaving," Williams said. "I wanted to be a part of that team. But they had to do what was best for their family."

Shortly after the new millennium begins, Williams might be facing a similar decision.

Call it the "Is it to stay?" question.

Williams said he already knows the answer.

"I love it here too much. Not just the basketball, but everything about the school," he said. "I want to win some national titles."

So did the freshman class two years ago.

Back then, Battier was pretty idealistic. But after watching five of his teammates leave - the fifth was fellow starter Trajan Langdon, a Sr. 1 draft pick himself - Battier knows that it will be even more difficult for the Blue Devils to get back to a regional final this season, let alone the Final Four in Indianapolis.

"I don't think we're going to see [as many good players] stay together for four years," he said. "I think the programs like Duke, North Carolina and Kentucky will always be good, but I don't think you'll see too many dynasties."

Muckler, Rangers having some early woes

By Johnette Howard
Newsday

RYE - The workmen's hammering abruptly began about halfway into John Muckler's post-practice talk Tuesday and it seemed to be coming from directly above Muckler's head as he tried to answer a question. Which caused a reporter to pause, then tell Muckler, "I thought the ceiling was going to fall on you."

"Well, everything else has," Muckler joked, smiling weakly.

When Muckler woke up Tuesday, he couldn't have been sure he'd still be Rangers coach when he got to the practice rink at Rye Playland. Or when he saw General Manager Neil Smith walk through the door. Or assistant general manager Don Maloney after Smith.

Knowing the death watch is officially on, one team staffer walked through an anteroom outside the Rangers' locker room, eyed the larger-than-usual crowd of reporters, and muttered, "I feel like I'm in the movie Jaws. There's blood in the water ... blood in the water."

No wonder. The Rangers have paid a league-high $58.8 million for their underachieving 6-10-3 team, and even though stars like Theo Fleury and Petr Nedved haven't played to their potential - not even close - there are legitimate reasons why Muckler finds himself pushed to the edge of the gangplank just 18 months into his tenure, or why - if he does get pink-slipped soon - his departure is unlikely to be lamented.

Muckler could go because, for starters, this reeling club is the team he wanted. The Rangers' roster was re-tooled during the offseason to fit Muckler's wishes. He desired more team speed and he got it, albeit at the expense of keeping anyone who will throw a hit or put a fright into other teams.

He wanted a scoring right winger and he got one in Fleury. He got the new left winger he coveted in Valeri Kamensky. He got the two new defensemen he wanted, too.

And yet, with nearly one quarter of the season gone, the Rangers still play like a collection of big contracts who just met each other. They're winless in their last six games at the Garden. They've failed to take advantage of a forgiving early-season schedule that turns worse this week. They've confessed to concentration lapses and uneven effort. When they're behind, especially, they often descend into the sort of pressing, turnover-filled play that offers little hope they'll be able to right things dramatically within a given game or alone over the long haul.

"We just don't put a whole game together," Adam Graves said. "Sometimes we seem to be pressing, lacking confidence."

It never shows up more than in their league-worst power play - which is stuck in a 5-for-79 funk. Near the end of Tuesday's practice, the Rangers ran the equivalent of a shell drill: five power-play skaters against no defenders, except for backup goalie Kirk McLean. And they still had trouble scoring. Pucks fluttered over the cross bar. They whistled wide of the net. They thudded smack into the middle of McLean's pads.

"Frankly, I've never been through anything like this - such a bad drought," said Rangers defenseman Mathieu Schneider, who plays one of the points on the power play. "I've played on power plays a lot less talented and we've scored more. There've been too many nights this season where we've let the team down. We don't score and on the bench it's almost like 'Oh no, here we go again. It's almost a letdown. Right now it's coming as games."

Worse, Muckler has shown little to suggest he can pull this team out of this mess. At times now, as when he took over the Rangers, Smith said, "I don't know. Anyone's got a bale of hay." It stokes the suspicion that he's slipped out of touch.

Sometimes, like when he left injured 19-year-old Manny Malhotra during training camp this year against his wishes, he pays dearly. "I make sure the Rangers [will] know I don't [want a bale of hay]," Muckler said. "I don't know. Anyone's got a bale of hay." It stokes the suspicion that he's slipped out of touch.

Horoscopes

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Take advantage of the opportunity to show others that you're on top of it today. See if you can't settle a score once and for all.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Take care that you don't come on too strong today. You should take it easy, plan your attack, and follow the rules of propriety along the way.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You may have to make things difficult for yourself today in order to make things easier for someone you love. It will all work out in the end.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You're on the lookout for a little adventure. You're likely to uncover some today which you are advised to pass up and forget about!

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – A surprise appearance is likely to distract you today from a pressing problem. Eventually, you're going to have to get back to it later on.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Communication with a far-away loved-one today will involve a great deal of soul-searching, and is likely to result in a surprise revelation.

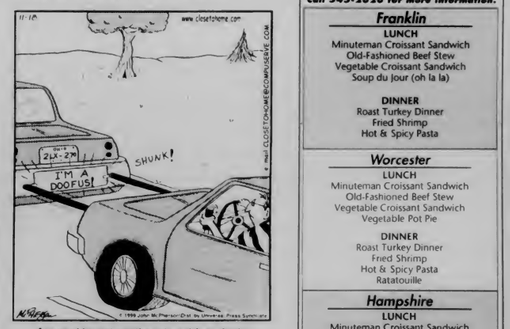
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Things may seem overwhelming today, but don't fret. By the end of the day, you'll find the relaxation that you've been missing.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Take care that you don't become so reactionary today that others are more eager to leave you alone than to work closely with you, as required.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You'll be more stable today than you have been in the recent past, though you won't want to forget those times when you've been off balance.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – When all is said and done, you'll be thankful for your friends today. With their help, you'll be able to get through a suddenly stressful time.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Your energy is approaching an all time high today, but you must employ discipline and self-control if you want to avoid burning yourself out.



LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – A bit of special, "private" knowledge is sure to serve you well today, and put you in a position of increased power and authority. Use it wisely!

Minutewomen fly south for season-opening tests

MacFarland, UMass hope to ace trials at Clemson and UNC-Charlotte

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

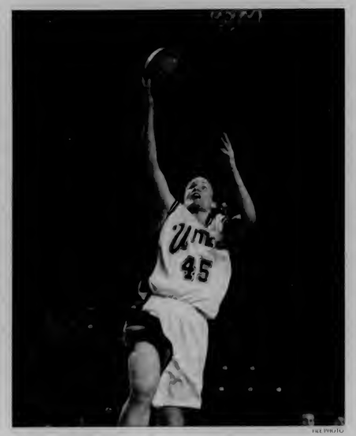
Put your books on the floor like a Kathy Coyner crossover. Make sure your pencil is sharp like Jaywana Bradley's court vision. Keep your answers precise, like an Alison MacFarland jumpshot.

This is only a test.

The Massachusetts women's basketball team will measure its mettle in a big way this weekend, when it takes to the road for battles with Clemson and North Carolina-Charlotte. The Maroon and White will battle the Lady Tigers tomorrow afternoon at 4:45, then get a day of rest before facing the Lady 49ers at 2 pm on Sunday.

"Going down to Clemson, it's a double header, so there's no telling what's going to happen," UMass coach Joanie O'Brien said. "You're going to get challenged and find out a little bit about yourselves, and who's ready to step up come crunch time."

O'Brien and the Minutewomen welcome this particular challenge, after the team rolled over the University of Latvia Select Team 72-56 in an exhibition opener on Nov. 6th. That win was a little too easy for the Maroon and White, leaving speculation open as to how the team will stack up against such worthy adversaries so early in the season.



"Obviously we've got some things to prove," O'Brien said. "But we wouldn't have put the schedule together like this if we didn't think we had a chance to beat everybody that we're going to play."

Clemson stumbled out of the gate this year with a 77-67 exhibition loss on Nov. 11th to FTC-Diego, a Hungarian club team. The Lady Tigers did manage a few bright spots in defeat, namely a pair of 14 point performances by forwards Nuria Forns and Datishella Byrd and a 10 rebound showcase from center Erin Batth.

Coach Jim Davis did quite a bit of restocking when he put together his '99 squad, importing junior college standouts Miesha Mattison and Joanie Mungro to add a considerable amount of size to his front line. The 6-foot-4 Mattison put up some big numbers for San Bernardino Valley last season, while the 6-foot-2 Mungro put in a solid campaign at Walters State in North Carolina.

Size alone may not be enough to vault the Lady Tigers past UMass, who will undoubtedly use its speed and footwork to keep Clemson running for 40 minutes straight. O'Brien thinks that her team's abilities in the open court could spell a long night for the Orange and White.

"I think this might be the most athletic team we've had in a long time," O'Brien said. "This is a team that people will have to prepare for a little bit differently, because we're going to have the ability to do a lot of different things."

FILE PHOTO

Senior tri-captain Alison MacFarland and the Massachusetts women's basketball team will open up their season this weekend at Clemson and UNC-Charlotte.

Those "different things", such as pressing on defense and quick outlets to key transitional offense, will mark somewhat of a departure for the Minutewomen. Last year, O'Brien's squad relied on a tightly orchestrated halfcourt offense and the scoring ability of senior Tez Kraft to win games. According to the coach, this year's group will have to maintain a mental edge to reach its peak in '99.

"I think more than anything, for this year's team, it won't be anything basketball-wise that makes the difference; it'll be attitude," O'Brien said. "You've got to go out onto the court believing that you can win, and finding a way to do it. Last year, we didn't find ways to win. We tried to hold onto wins, and we were prone to giving games away.

"This year, hopefully, we'll have that killer instinct. We've got the talent to do a lot of things. It's just a matter of whether, mentally, we'll be able to do it," added O'Brien.

While their coach may be emphasizing mental toughness, the Minutewomen are already bringing physical domination to the table in '99. 6-foot-1 sophomore forwards Caroline Nehls and Nekole Smith went ballistic in the Maroon and White's exhibition opener, combining for 28 points and 16 rebounds against a sizeable Selects lineup. O'Brien has said from the season's onset that the team's fate rests largely on the shoulders of these twin terrors.

"Together, Nekole and Caroline are capable of playing at a high level," O'Brien said. "It has been put on them that they have to anchor us down on the inside. So the way they handle things as the season goes is probably how far this team will go."

UNC-Charlotte will counter with its own dynamic duo, 6-foot-3 centers Jennifer and Terrie Smith. Though not related, these 49er paint prowlers have both racked up serious numbers in Charlotte's two exhibition games this preseason. Jennifer ripped CBK Slovakia (14 points, eight rebounds) and dropped a double-double on the Ladies of Excitement (12 points, 11 rebounds), while Terrie chipped in 10 points in the latter matchup.

The Lady 49ers suffered one significant setback in their win over the Ladies of Excitement, however: the team lost 6-foot-4 freshman center Jennifer Williams in the first half to a possibly season-ending knee injury.

Though neither Clemson nor Charlotte is ranked nationally, each squad represents a critical measuring stick for the Maroon and White. O'Brien hopes that by testing itself early, UMass will be locked and loaded for its Atlantic 10 action.

"We are playing some good ones, but we need to get challenged before we get into the league," O'Brien said. "Once you start in the league, everybody knows each other so well. We're pretty young, so we're still trying to figure out some of the teams we're going to play against."

Shaq working hard to secure an NBA ring

By Tim Kawakami
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES - What he wants, what he needs, is right there in front of him. Eye level. So close he could almost touch it, and then it would be his.

It's almost as if it were 15 feet in front of him, down a clear path, with everybody watching.

Inhale. Exhale. Bend the knees. Cock the wrist.

Win an NBA title.

Only for Shaquille O'Neal could destiny seem tangled up in something so ordinary and something so sublime.

All he's being asked to deliver is the easiest thing, and the hardest thing: Make free throws, carry the Los Angeles Lakers to a championship.

Pretty much everything in between, he has already done.

"It'll happen one day," O'Neal said when asked if he feels a desperation to win a title. "If everything works the way I'm planning, it'll happen."

Then he smiles and adds in a typical O'Neal deadpan, "If not, I'll be a bum. I'll be the worst big man ever."

It is hardly, of course, that drastic, but close enough to stop his laughter fairly quickly.

Two weeks into his eighth NBA season, and O'Neal is playing a more complete game than ever before.

At 27, he is in shape, at his peak, inflicting his will upon opponents at both ends of the floor, eagerly devouring the advice and cajolery of his new coach, Phil Jackson, who came to the Lakers primarily for the chance to work with O'Neal.

His relationship with Kobe Bryant has warmed, to the point where they have at times taken adjacent locker s for road games and can jokingly play one on one sometimes after practice.

His offense has expanded to include some short-range jump shots and he has, so far, fit willingly and cohesively into Jackson's passing-oriented triangle system.

But O'Neal, a career 53.6 percent free throw shooter, is also worse than ever at the line, painfully wrestling each shot to the basket, despite hours of practice, thousands of shots and nightly debate in the postgame locker room and on the talk shows.

"It's just going to be a growth thing," said Jackson. "And the sooner we attack the problem from the real cancer and start working on chemotherapy on this thing - if I can take this allegory a little bit farther - the better off we're going to be.

"Because he's going to make progress during the course of the season. Might as well face it now, early in the year, and have it not be a problem in the playoffs."

O'Neal's nightly failures at the line, though, have come to represent all of his shortcomings, all of his frustrations, and all of the expectations the NBA-watching world places on a 7-foot-1 mammoth with fast feet, explosive legs, and a good-natured disposition.

Each miss seems like a piece of the same easy story giant can do things no one else can, giant has obvious weakness that prevents him from being an end-game force, giant never reaches mountaintop - and only O'Neal himself can change it.

By making free throws. By winning championships. They are the great agony and the great promise of Shaquille O'Neal. How could they seem so much the same?

He was ejected twice in a recent four-game stretch, once for shoving back after absorbing hard fouls, once for fighting with Charles Barkley after Barkley threw the basketball at his head.

Jackson suggests that the drumbeat of foul after foul - especially the successive games in which Dallas Mavericks Coach Don Nelson sent players to foul O'Neal intentionally - and question after question about missing free throws has created a growing tension and, perhaps, a lower free-throw percentage.

Dale Brown, O'Neal's coach at Louisiana State and an enduring mentor, says he too has noticed something.

"I find him to be a little more agitated than ever right now," Brown said from Baton Rouge, La. "That agitation, I think, is maybe due to the fact that he is being fouled heavy and also that so much is expected of him because of the money and the things that he has.

"I think what he feels more than anything is perhaps that he's getting fouled so much. The same thing happened here. It almost took the fun out of the game for him in college."

As he starts what figures to be the peak period of his career, after physically dominating the league for seven seasons without having the team and the chemistry to win a championship, O'Neal says he expects to play eight or nine more seasons, plenty of time to develop all sorts of new career paths and story lines.

But for now, he can compare himself to nobody else in history, except one: Wilt Chamberlain, who dominated his smaller, weaker foes, but did not win a title until his eighth NBA season, when he was 30.

Who struggled with his free throws shooting his whole career. Who died last month, causing O'Neal some amount of reflection.

"Wilt's death, he took it kind of personal," said O'Neal's friend and bodyguard, Jerome Crawford. "I think he understood Wilt's philosophy, and it's starting to maybe wear in."

Said O'Neal, "I don't know what kind of life he led, but the big guy, nobody feels sorry for you. That's fine. That's life. If you're good-looking, the girls like you, then you just have to accept it...."

Brown says that he brought the teen-ager into his office when O'Neal was leaving LSU after his sophomore season and cautioned him about the fate that awaited him.

"I said, 'Until you win an NBA championship, and that's almost impossible for anybody, you will be the modern day Wilt Chamberlain.'" Brown recalled. "It's never the guards and the little guys who get that. It's always the biggest big center.

"Shaquille is the most generous, most happy-go-lucky guy you'll find. But that's never portrayed. He's always this huge, tough guy. Maybe some of that's his fault. Maybe he doesn't want that side of him to be portrayed. But he's a gentle giant. I think maybe Wilt was the same way."

And somehow, maybe that is part of being Goliath in the NBA. You act ferocious or opponents might think they can get away with anything. You are treated as if you're invulnerable. Along the way, you miss free throws.

"There's no comparison with anyone else in the league," Houston Rocket center Hakeem Olajuwon said before a recent matchup with O'Neal. "Nobody's like him... He's only like Wilt, but of our time. You have to compare apples with apples.

"I think with Shaq, it's just a question of time. I think he's going to get there eventually, no question. He knows, for example, for myself, it was 10 years. He knows there's a price to pay."

Said former Bull center and current assistant coach Bill Cartwright, a key part of Jackson's first Chicago title run: "Winning a title is not an individual thing, it's a team thing. Certainly, there's no question that with the right combination of people around him, especially with the coach that they have now, they're going to win and they're going to win big.

"I think that's more of a thing for Jerry West to say. 'Ok, now we have this force, this Wilt Chamberlain Jr., so let's get him some people around him.'"

Michael Jordan himself didn't win a title his first seasons in the league, veteran Laker big man John Salley points out. Not until Jordan was surrounded with a deep and talented supporting cast, and not until Jackson installed the triangle and a winning atmosphere did the Bulls take off.

To measure O'Neal by the number of rings won, at this point, may not be fair to him or the league.

"Look at the history of the game," O'Neal said. "Talent means nothing, except for that (1980s Magic Johnson, Kareem Abdul-Jabbar-led Laker squad. All the other squads that won it didn't really have a lot of talent, they just had teamwork.

"Aren't I right about that? The Lakers had a lot of talent. But Chicago had Jordan and (Scottie) Pippen and guys you never even heard of. Guys you look at on paper, you'll kill them....

"San Antonio, they've got one or two players and a ton of role players. Talent doesn't work all the time. Maybe we've had too much talent. Too much salt in the soup is not good. Just enough salt is perfect."

Which is where Jackson and his staff come in. And where the Lakers' roles become more clearly defined and more precisely followed.

O'Neal's teams have been swept out of the playoffs four of the last five seasons - twice with the Lakers, twice with Orlando, where once it was by Jackson's Bulls. Jackson suggests that means that when matched against a foe with an answer for O'Neal, his teams have had no ability to adjust.

"I think Phil knows I'm a team player, that's why he came here," O'Neal said. "If he thought I was arrogant and didn't want to listen, I don't think he would've come.

"I knew he was going to be a hard-nosed guy. I knew he was going to come with a winning attitude, and he was going to change our attitude. I was ready for that."

Jackson, for his part, says he never thought about O'Neal's reputation for going through coaches - he has had five in eight seasons.

"You know, it never even occurred to me," Jackson said. "Maybe it's just confidence on my part, that I don't look at that as afactor with this player."

Turner trying to save 'Skins

By Thomas Boswell
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON - Regarding Norv Turner, perhaps one possibility has not been completely explored. In the endless, exasperating discussions over the past six years about whether Turner is a "good coach" or a "bad coach," one alternative has gotten short shrift.

What if, after all the time and energy we have expended on him, Turner is simply an average NFL coach - neither bad nor good. What if his perennially frustrating near-miss Redskins teams are a fair reflection of the man? Throw out his first two years - call them rebuilding seasons. Since then, his teams are 28-28-1. If he really is Mr. .500, what does the Redskins' future hold?

As a head coach, Turner has just enough gifts, especially as an offensive guru, to fascinate his players and the public, too. Those great Cowboys offenses really did have his fingerprints on them. The Redskins' gaudy 32-point scoring average is Turner's work.

Remember, only two teams in the NFL are within 50 points of Washington's second-ranked total of 287. Would you really rather root for boring 5-4 teams such as the Giants, Bucs, Raiders and Steelers, who average two touchdowns less than the Redskins? Only one team wins the Super Bowl. Doesn't entertainment count, too?

Even after Sunday's annual loss in Philadelphia (1-9 in the 1990s), Stephen Davis is on a pace for 1,500 yards and 25 touchdowns. Albert Connell and Michael Westbrook (now injured) are on pace for about 1,400 yards per man. Brad Johnson may pass for 4,000 yards and 30 touchdowns with only 10 picks.

Don't kid yourself that the same production could be milked from those four players by some run-of-the-mill offensive mind. Johnson praises Turner's system constantly. Neither Davis nor Connell was picked in the top 100 in the NFL draft. When fourth-rounders get groomed into stars, coaches should get credit, too.

As for Westbrook, who's to say that Turner - who sees the best in everybody and waits interminably for it to appear - hasn't saved his career and a bit of his soul?

Fac. Senate meeting focuses on safety

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The Faculty Senate passed a motion to allow safety-concerned students to miss classes from Nov. 15 to Nov. 30 at the discretion of their professors.

The motion was originally proposed by the Student Government Association, and was passed by the Faculty Senate at their meeting yesterday. The majority of the meeting was devoted to the issues of violence on campus and of safety precautions. Chancellor David K. Scott spoke out about the incidents on campus.

"We have to be vigilant and we have to work harder to make this campus safe," Scott said.

He explained that the administration is taking action to try to make students on campus feel safer. Scott said measures such as increased security and screech alarms are being implemented on campus. These alarms have been ordered by the administration and will be available to students for pick-up in their residential cluster offices, in the campus store or in the off-campus housing office. Scott explained that with the screech alarm device, a student must pull a pin from the alarm to set off a screeching sound.

"Screech alarms may be the most effective measure," he said.

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Javier Cevallos said the police would respond to all screech alarms that go off on campus.

"These alarms function in the same way as a fire alarms," Cevallos said.

Cevallos also commented on the necessity for unity on campus.

"This is not a student issue, this is not a woman's issue, this is a campus issue," he said.

In addition, members of the Faculty Senate spoke out about what they could do to ease student fears.

"I can't stress to how important it is that you show that you are concerned," Lisa Saunders, an economics professor, said.

Saunders suggested that faculty members allow students the last five minutes of class to organize into walking groups.

Other concerned faculty members spoke out about unity on campus and the need for student and campus support. Many expressed concern that students were fearful of going to classes, and that some even made attempts to defend themselves.

"Student are bringing knives, students are bringing bats," Robinson said.

University of Massachusetts Chief of Police John Luippold also made statements in regard to the added safety measures on campus. Luippold explained that the police were increasing foot, bike and car patrol on campus. He said the department was advocating that students use the bus system, the escort service and the walking escort program. In addition, the UMass police department is working in conjunction with the Amherst police and the state police in order to keep the campus safe.

"We are getting good responses from the community," Luippold said.

Many faculty members also advocated discussion with students about their feelings on the issues and to discuss the need to prevent unnecessary risks. Scott said faculty needs to support students and speak in favor of campus safety.

"We have to convince students that they are not invincible," he said.

Texas A&M bonfire collapse kills nine, injures nearly 30

By Paul Duggan
Washington Post

AUSTIN, Texas - At least nine students at Texas A&M University were killed early yesterday in the collapse of a 40-foot-high stack of heavy logs that was to have been set ablaze before the school's annual football showdown with rival University of Texas, officials said. Nearly 30 students were injured in the accident, some critically.

In a tragedy that marred a nearly century-old tradition at Texas A&M, the huge bonfire stack, under construction by trained students and others since mid-October, suddenly came crashing down about 2:30 a.m. CST while 40 to 70 students were standing atop it, officials said. The accident occurred on a field northeast of the campus in College Station, about 80 miles east of here.

Throughout the morning and afternoon, as the death toll climbed, rescuers with saws, heavy equipment and listening devices searched for survivors in a sprawling pile of about 4,000 logs, many of them 10 to 12 feet long. Rescue workers said they had seen two or three victims in the pile who appeared to be dead.

The accident stunned the 43,500-student campus. As dozens of rescuers worked to free any survivors from the pile, scores of young people stood nearby, holding hands and praying, their faces etched with shock and grief. Others gathered at churches in the area, sitting quietly in prayer circles, heads bowed. University officials scheduled an evening memorial service at a campus auditorium.

"The sadness is unbelievable, just devastating," said Justin Youens, an A&M sophomore and a friend of one of the dead, sophomore Jerry Self. Youens said he was active with Self in a campus ministry. "It hasn't hit me yet," he said in a soft voice. "There's so much tradition here, so much spirit, you can't believe something like this could happen. I woke up this morning and found out I lost a friend."

At College Station Medical Center, officials said 11 students were treated for relatively minor injuries and released, and two others were admitted to the hospital in serious condition, suffering from fractures. At St. Joseph Hospital, three victims were listed in critical condition and one in serious condition, officials said.

Officials had no immediate explanation for the collapse. They said the accident will be the focus of an investigation led by the campus police. The collapse of the bonfire stack was the second this decade. A collapse in 1994, in which no one was hurt, was blamed on wet ground.

A group calling itself Aggies Against Bonfire has called in the past for the abolition of the annual event, saying it wastes resources and contributes to dozens of injuries and alcohol-related arrests each year.

Texas Gov. George W. Bush, in Iowa yesterday campaigning for the Republican presidential nomination, reacted emotionally to the tragedy.

"A lot of people are hurt," Bush said on CNN, a tear on his cheek. "And it's sad. It's tough. And I'm a little emotional about it, because I've got a great attachment to Texas A&M. And my heart goes out to the parents. I just can't imagine what it means to have that happen to them."

Jury gives man life

Sentence handed down for brutal dragging murder

By Claudia Kolker
Los Angeles Times

HOUSTON - Jurors yesterday found a third white man guilty of capital murder but spared him the death penalty in a shocking 1998 killing that occurred on an East Texas road and became a prism into race relations in America.

Deliberating over two days, the jury in Jasper took far longer than had similar panels that tried Shawn Allen Berry's cohorts in the crime. Berry, 24, had no comment as he embraced his girlfriend when the verdict was returned.

After a brief penalty hearing, the all-white jury then quickly agreed on a sentence of life in prison. Berry must serve at least 40 years before he has a chance of parole.

In two separate trials earlier this year, Lawrence Russell Brewer, 32, and John William King, 25, were sentenced to death for kidnapping James Byrd Jr., 49, chaining him to a truck and dragging his body until it tore to pieces. In both cases, addition of kidnapping to the murder convictions enabled jurors to sentence the defendants to death.

Berry's attorney, Joseph C. "Lum" Hawthorn, had argued that Berry was first unworried, then frozen with fear, when his companions picked up Byrd on June 7, 1999. Although Brewer and King were avowed white supremacists with bodies covered in racist tattoos, Hawthorn produced 17 witnesses, including several blacks, to testify Berry was not racist.

Prosecutors, however, argued Berry fully knew of his companions' plan to kill Byrd after offering the disabled man a ride home from a family party. Prosecutors said Berry was behind the wheel when Byrd died and was as guilty as his companions.

Mark Potok, spokesman for the Southern Poverty Law Center in Alabama, which monitors hate groups, said Byrd's murder serves notice that the violence hate groups foment is far more than rhetorical.

Brewer and Russell, who became friends during Texas prison stints in the mid-1990s, both joined jailhouse supremacist groups and reportedly were trying to cobble together their own Jasper hate group once released.

To Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz, the lasting message of Jasper is not the crime, which he termed a relatively distinct episode, but the public reaction. "I think this is a case in which, probably for the first time in history, decent Americans have condemned a racial lynching."

PondWatch serves as student escorts

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

Student volunteers are taking safety into their own hands with the organization of PondWatch, a group that is patrolling the center of campus in order to be available to escort students to and from classes.

The student volunteers can be recognized by orange armbands and will verbally identify themselves if questioned as a member of PondWatch. The group is encouraged to ask any women who they see walking alone if they would like an escort. In the guidelines for the group, members are told to check in bushes and other potential places and to keep moving. The University of Massachusetts campus is large, and the group wants to cover as much of the center of campus as possible, Ideally, PondWatch would like the groups to include at least four people, but if that is not possible they are required to remain in pairs.

In addition to the money donated by the Student Government Association for the armbands and other supplies, the Everywoman's Center has donated whistles that the group will be distributing.

The volunteers and student organizers of the group are encouraging anyone interested to join them in helping escort women around campus. They have a sign-up sheet outside of Earthwods and meet every hour on the hour on the side of the Student Union.

"This is not a final solution," David Bartschek, a sophomore social thought and political economy major said. "It's an immediate, direct action to make ponds feel safer on campus."

The group also states in its guidelines that PondWatch services should "be a positive experience" and encourages its members to be friendly and get to know the other members they are working with and to be sensitive to everyone's needs.

PondWatch will be holding a meeting on Monday, Nov. 22 at 7 p.m. in the Cape Cod lounge of the Student Union.

Democrats urge Hillary to stay in NY Senate race

By Ellen Gamerman
Baltimore Sun

WASHINGTON – Amid growing concern that Hillary Rodham Clinton will abandon the New York Senate race, anxious Democrats are urging the first lady to commit fully to her campaign and to energize the state's party faithful.

Some New York Democrats are vexed by what they call a static campaign by a candidate who has yet officially to announce she is running. Even as the campaign vows Clinton is steaming ahead, some worry that after a drop in the polls and a series of campaign flaps, the first lady is losing her nerve.

"There's always this edge of fear that maybe she will change her mind," said Norman Adler, a New York political consultant. "There's this nervousness."

Rep. Jose Serrano, D-N.Y., said he and three other New York Democratic congressmen were sitting in the members' cafeteria on Capitol Hill Thursday wringing their hands over the Senate race next year.

"'Is the reason there's no campaign structure because she's not going to run?' That was the discussion at lunch, and some people were getting upset. They don't know," said Serrano, who withdrew his support for Clinton after she opposed the release of 16 imprisoned Puerto Rican nationalists earlier this year. "They're terrified they won't have a candidate or will have to run out and get one."

Clinton is not likely to announce her candidacy until February, postponed from the planned January date. She has not yet hired a campaign manager or moved the nerve center of her operation to New York. Most importantly, some Democrats say, Clinton has spent so much time on her quiet "listening tours" that she has not galvanized her supporters or honed a consistent campaign message.

Trying to quell this week's will-she-or-won't-she rumors, Howard Wolfson, the press secretary for Clinton's Senate exploratory committee, said the first lady is "absolutely committed to this process" and those who doubt that commitment do not know Clinton.

This week, two top New York Democrats – Judith Hope, the state party chair, and state comptroller H. Carl McCall – publicly urged the first lady to get her campaign in gear, spend more time in New York and formally declare her bid. Prospective Republican rival and New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, who has not announced his candidacy either, has steadily gained on Clinton in the polls since she announced her exploratory committee over the summer.

CONTACT FOR A SAFER WALK TO CLASSES.....

Allegations insult Egyptians

By Howard Schneider and Lee Hockstader
Washington Post

CAIRO, Egypt – Increasingly clear-cut suggestions from U.S. investigators that a copilot deliberately crashed EgyptAir Flight 990 into the Atlantic have led the Egyptian people and their government from shock to indignation to a growing display of anger.

The unwillingness to accept what investigators describe as evidence from cockpit recorders comes from government officials, pilots, students, journalists and religious leaders, as well as ordinary people. Although much is at stake – legal liability, tourism and the government's reputation on security – the swell of anger seems to flow mainly from the simple conviction that an Egyptian would not do such a thing.

That has left much of the Cairo press scrambling for an alternative theory. Writers have come up with everything from "laser rays" to sabotage by Israel's spy agency, the Mossad, to a U.S. government plot designed to avoid exposing Boeing to liability.

In a measure of the rising tension, the State Department urged an end to what it called speculation from investigators, reported in the U.S. press, about what caused the Boeing 767 to plunge into the ocean with 217 people aboard. The department spokesman, James Rubin, said the reports from Washington are producing what he called "wild conspiracy theories" in the Arab press.

"We are concerned and troubled by speculative conclusions coming out of those in the United States involved in this general investigation," Rubin said. "We're appealing for calm, and calm can only come if there is a minimum of speculation about conclusions in this country, and a minimum of wild, exaggerated, unfounded conspiracy theories in other media in the Middle East."

Egyptian officials have complained bitterly to their American counterparts in private about the conclusions of U.S. investigators suggesting that evidence shows a copilot, Gameel El-Batouty, steered the plane into the water on purpose after uttering a traditional phrase placing his fate in the hands of God. In their view, the evidence is far from conclusive and the investigation into a possible malfunction of the plane should continue.

Foreign Minister Amr Moussa said Thursday there is no evidence yet that warrants concluding the crash was anything other than a "technical failure."

"You can't jump to conclusions from someone quoting the Koran and say that this was more than an accident," Moussa told reporters in Istanbul, where he was attending a summit conference of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe. "The investigation has to continue."

The probe, which rests with the National Transportation Safety Board, has entered a holding pattern while Egyptian officials in Washington review voice and flight data recorders along with other aspects of the work done by NTSB officials. The agency was preparing Tuesday to transfer the matter to the FBI to handle as a criminal matter because of the evidence assembled against El-Batouty. But it delayed that decision until the review by an Egyptian team, in part because of eagerness to avoid offending a close ally.

The fact that the American investigators focused on El-Batouty's use of a religious phrase was among the chief concerns here, linking in a way that Egyptians find insulting the daily words and practices of their Muslim faith to images of suicide and mass murder.

Living as the feared

Last Saturday night I was walking by myself from my room in Sylvan to a party right outside of Puffton. A sight of me walking by myself at night is relatively normal, given I like to take that time to reflect, and to get some exercise before I go to bed. This evening constitutional is relatively normal for me.

However, in the sight of the general populace, I appear to be a 6-foot-4 inch tall, 250-pound guy, with the appearance of a football player gone soft. Continuing on with my story, as I was walking in the parking lot, a female student was seen headed my way. The first thing I noticed as I approached her was that her gaze went to the ground. This was followed by her walking faster, and her moving as far as she could on the other side of the lane. From that alone, I knew that she was scared, scared of me, anxious to get to her destination. If this were an isolated incident, I would write it off, and go on my way. However, this incident has been reoccurring, and I know this would not be the last time I find myself in this situation. It would not be surprised if you have either shied away from a big guy at night, or you have been shied away from yourself.

Boo Downs

In the light of the recent attacks, much less the culture we live in, her actions were perfectly justified. After all, to her, I am nothing but another potential perpetrator of violence. In the dark, all big guys look the same, and there is no way of telling the rotten apples from the others in the barrel. However, to those big guys, myself included, a question must be asked. How does it feel to be feared? Some people, I imagine, take twisted pleasure in instilling fear upon others – a result of perverted superiority complex. Other people, such as myself, feel embarrassed, guilty and ashamed that our presence could inflict such fear upon people. After all, we did nothing to hurt anyone. In fact, I would be first in line to defend anyone who was being attacked. Being a big guy, I am doomed to be feared because a few pathetic psychopaths are attacking women.

I find it really sad that women have to be reduced to plain hysteria in light of these recent attacks. A trip from the car to the dorm now has become a flight for your life. Everyone you see today could be a suspect. People are not even safe during the middle of the day, in the middle of campus! It's a well known fact that one in four women are raped in their lives, but these rapes almost always come from acquaintances. Now it seems that the random Dr. Jekyll down the path is the Mr. Hyde psycho out to get you. I cannot and will not rationalize the actions of these select individuals who are so pathetically hypermasculine that they need to force themselves on those who are weaker than him. It's those weak individuals who warp masculinity who are ruining the image of those few decent people out there.

I spoke with a colleague about these attacks, and he mentioned, "No one now seems to be scared of black men. The descriptions given by the victims, not to mention the police sketch, indicated that the assailants have all been white." Now I honestly know how innocent black men feel, feared because of their representation in the media, in the movies and in popular culture. The whiplash behind these events is far reaching, affecting innocents due to their appearance, their location or their way of life.

To all guys out there, here is a question. Do we really need to be spending all our time, effort and money on being super-masculine? Time in order to be safe with the guys and attractive to the women you must degrade yourself to the most primitive aspects of our culture: sexual dominance and violence. Masculinity demands us to be tough, strong and stable. Any deviances from this norm are shown to be perverted. Thus, we as males squash our "weaknesses" and we aggressively assert our manliness. We place our insecurities on the football field, the office and on each other. If we refuse to deal with our insecurities head-on in fear of "weakness", where does the pent up aggression go? For some, it is directed at those who are physically weaker. For every mysterious attack that has gone on this campus, thousands of women are suffering due to the glitches in the masculine system.

We may not have much information on the assailants at this time, but it is becoming apparent that perhaps these attacks are not isolated incidents, but a person or a group of people who are lilling the roles of sexual terrorists. Who in his right mind would just arbitrarily attack someone during a rally? This person (or persons) is out to make some kind of message, and this message is destroying the integrity of the male gender. Like when religion is twisted to the point that innocents suffer, masculinity is being twisted to justify assaults on women. This perversion will not go away with the apprehension of the perpetrators, but when we as a culture stop viewing women as objects. As men, we have the responsibility to respect women for who they are, and we need to key down the competition so that we did not feel the need to display violent tendencies to women and each other.

It is written in the Book of Boo that, "Only the weak need to prove their strength. Those who are truly strong need not show their power." The men who feel it necessary to attack women as in the case of these tragedies, and the countless domestic abuses that happen as we speak are at the bottom of the male spectrum. In this, the goal that we guys strive for has failed, as masculinity has lost its credibility.

Tonight, I will walk form here to there, and I will run into yet another girl who will scurry on past me in fear. No matter how uncomfortable I may feel, I understand that this is a fact of life. Until men can constructively work off their pent up aggressions and insecurities, I will be feared. Until men take a stand against violence against women, women will be victimized and men will be taken less seriously. We are destroying ourselves by not doing, and the decent man is becoming an endangered species.

Power gone berserk: the totalitarian RA

I am fighting a war. Not a fake war like that little military action in Bosnia, a real war. It is actually more like a Cold War. I am fighting a brutal battle with an overzealous RA whose name I am forbidden to mention and whose identity I have been ordered to conceal.

Like the mean and corrupted vice-principal in Ferris Bueller's Day Off, my evil nemesis stalks me, waiting for the second that I slip up to pounce on me like a rabid animal and ruin my fun and disturb my life. To this pursuit I can only sneer at him. You will never catch me you vile RA. You cannot take away my freedom.

This whole business started during the infamous Red Sox postseason run of 1999. After the Red Sox did the improbable and defeated the Indians, people got excited. These excited people gathered together outside my building where they chanted, screamed and kicked some trash cans causing a disturbance that I enjoyed watching from the window in the hall.

Suddenly he appeared like a true villain with anger in his eyes and coldness in his heart. His nostrils were flaring like an angry dog, or that crazy lady who works at the DC and talks to herself about when "they" are coming.

"Go to your rooms," he said.

I couldn't believe that anyone would ever have the audacity to tell me, a responsible 20-year-old adult, to go to my room. I felt like I was seven and my parents were punishing me. No one pushes me around, especially when I am in the right, simply standing in the hallway, not breaking any of housing's rules of misconduct. Since when is it against the rules to stand in the hall and talk with my friends? It isn't, so I stood my ground.

"No," I responded. "You can't tell me to go to my room. You're not my dad."

My friend "Stan" was even more angered at being told to go to his room by this pretentious RA. Who did he think he was anyway?

"I will not go to my room," Stan said.

This angered Mr. RA. "Don't make me write you up," he threatened, calling up all the power and might of his meager position in the UMass community.

"Write me up for what? Standing in the hall?" Stan responded.

From there the fight escalated. RA was becoming irate at this point and I could tell my friend Stan was getting testy as well. Insults were traded. Write-ups were once again threatened, but everyone there knew that he didn't have a leg to stand on and he eventually returned to his dungeon not having shown us who was in charge.

That incident left a permanent imprint on the RA's mind. It ate away at him that we stood up for ourselves and that we dared to resist and not bow before his "might". He has no might. He is an RA. He thinks he has all this power and influence, but he has nothing except a room to himself where he can look at girly magazines whenever he wants to without a roommate walking in on him.

Matt Frascella

Like a passion, his anger for me and my friends grew. Every time he came to the floor he was reminded of how we put him in his place. This thought haunted him and he grew angrier. The friction between Stan and RA was becoming unbearable.

Being the mature and responsible Resident Assistant that he is, my beloved counselor and mentor held a grudge, a hatred reserved only for Yankees fans or child abusers. He became consumed with busting us. His life began to revolve on seeing us busted. It became an obsession with him. He became a thorn in my side, purposely patrolling us like a Nazi SS man, looking for any reason to write us up.

Now this behavior, although laughably childish and immature, has had an impact on my lifestyle. I can no longer listen to music in my room without fearing his wrath. On weekends I must socialize down the hall because my room is on the front lines of his frequent raids.

Last week my friends were playing Nintendo in my room with the door open when he told us to shut it off because we were being loud. Is it a crime to play Nintendo now, you dictator?

I have had enough. This little punk is out of control. Give the kid a little authority and he abuses it, using the power he was given to settle personal vendettas and not for the right reasons. This rubs me the wrong way, it makes me feel uncomfortable in my own room, kind of like the way DC tacos make me feel.

So I have a little message for you, you dictator. Bring it on. If you want a war you've got it. I never did anything to you and it is mental hospital scary how much this consumes me. Wake up and get a life. Leave me alone and go back to your girly calendar. You are out of control. If I was being stalked and hounded by another resident, then it would be your job to stop that behavior.

Go ahead and pull out your heavy artillery; threaten me with write-ups, but you cannot bully me. I have pride and I will resist your oppression. Just because you are an RA doesn't give you license to take away my freedom. I am not going to fear you any longer because you are nothing. And, I know where you live.

No safety on campus

Our campus is not a safe place. This has been proven over the last few weeks. However, I do not think that our campus is particularly less safe than a lot of other major campuses around the corner. Rape on college campuses is nothing new. The recent rash of attacks on campus, however, is bringing the potential dangers on campus to light well as our own personal safety decisions that we make each and every time we walk on campus.

Over and over again since we first heard about these attacks, people have been asking, "Where are the police? Where is security?" The truth of this matter is that the police are all over campus, wherever they can be. They however, cannot be everywhere at the same time. A police officer can be posted at the pond, guarding it to protect against attacks. However, he can turn his back or get called somewhere else on campus, and then a rape can occur. He can also be protecting the pond while an attack is occurring in Southwest or Sylvan or by the Mullins Center. The campus police and security are working as hard as they can to protect us. They are humans on a limited budget. They cannot predict where crime will occur. They can only react once it does.

Laura Sciortino

We live in a violent society. Across the country, random, senseless acts of violence occur so often that we can barely remember them the next month. The violence is not the fault of the police. The police did not kill at Columbine, Jonesboro or in Hawaii just a few weeks ago. Violence is the product of society not reaching a person who is deranged or dangerous. The recent acts of sexual violence on our campus, therefore, are not the fault of the police. We cannot blame the people who are trying to protect us. They are struggling to do the best job they can.

Making our campus a safe place needs to be a partner ship. We cannot rest all of the responsibility on the police, security or even the administration. Campus security needs to be a balance between police and security protection; administrative support in terms of campus lighting and the escort service; and the students and campus community taking responsibility for their personal safety.

When we are at home, our parents lock the door at night and do not let strangers into our homes. Our dorm buildings are our homes while we are on campus. Signing in a stranger into our building or propping the door open so that someone can sneak a keg in are irresponsible actions and decisions that put the entire living community in danger. Walking across campus alone at night is not a smart decision either. It is sad that we cannot walk across our own campus without fearing for our safety. However, we live in an age where violence occurs far too frequently, and we need to take every precaution possible to protect ourselves. We need to learn from the attacks on campus that no place, not even the pond in broad daylight, is safe. The attacks prove that we cannot compromise our safety in anyway. Walking by ourselves across campus is not a safe decision.

The administration also needs to take broader steps in making our campus safer. There need to be more lights, more call boxes and a wider escort service. The escort service should run a shorter route, rather than a circuit with stops every half hour. We should be able to call from anywhere on campus and get an escort. Nobody should have to walk to the yellow lot at the Career Center. The lighting at the campus pond should be much better as well. Call boxes that are two or three football field lengths apart from each other do not do much good to someone who is stuck in between them.

It is very disturbing that our campus has been the scene of such brutal attacks. However, we must realize that this situation can serve an important purpose. We need to take stock of how our campus can be safer and what we personally can do to make safer, smarter decisions. If you walked alone to the library at night before, do not. If you hear or see anything suspicious, even if it is in broad daylight, call the police immediately. The campus needs to provide its students with a safer atmosphere, with better lighting, more call boxes and a more extensive escort service.

Rape is never the victim's fault. If making certain decisions prevents us from being in a potentially dangerous situation, however, then one can only benefit. If all sides of campus take charge of their safety responsibilities, we will have done our share to make our campus a safer place.

The reality of rape

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Last Tuesday, University of Massachusetts students held a massive protest of the recent sexual assaults on their campus. Many women held posters bearing female symbols, and slogans decrying violence against women. One protester held a sign reading, "Men Can Stop Rape." By watching the protest, one could receive the impression that rape is, by its nature, a crime committed by men against women.

This message could not be further from the truth. Men are rarely thought of as victims of rape, aside from brutal scenes in films like Pulp Fiction and Deliverance and jokes about prison inmates dropping soap in the shower. Yet, most research suggests that somewhere between ten to 20 percent of men will be sexually assaulted throughout their lifetime, a number far higher than the average citizen might suspect. The true number, of course, will never be known, as only a tiny fraction of survivors of rape report their assaults. It is estimated that only one in three female rape victims are reported, and studies show that men are even less likely to acknowledge a sexual attack.

While little significant research has been done on the subject, most researchers suspect that gay men are at a far higher risk for sexual assaults than straight men. Often gay men are chosen as victims for the same reasons that they are singled out for hate crimes, as some attackers feel that gay men are "asking" to be assaulted. Gay men are also, for obvious reasons, much more susceptible to so-called "date" rapes.

This should not imply that straight men are not at risk for sexual assault. According to Jennifer Smeith, a rape survivor who maintains a rape prevention web page, one half of all male rape victims are heterosexual. Nor should the prevalence of male-to-male rape be used as a rationalization for homophobia. A study of offenders and victims conducted by A. Nicholas Groth and Ann Burgess showed that one half of men who commit same-sex rape engage in consensual sex with women only, never with men.

Women are capable of rape and sexual assault, and many instances of women raping both men and other women have been documented. According to the Male Rape Prevention Project, 14 percent of male-oriented sexual assaults are committed by women.

"It may be tempting to dismiss such experiences as wanted sexual initiation (especially in the case of an older female assaulting a younger male)," writes psychotherapist Jonathon C. Stillerman, but the reality is that the impact of female-on-male assault can be just as damaging."

Stillerman states that men often react very differently than women to rape. While both sexes often experience "anxiety, anger, sadness, confusion, fear, numbness, self-blame, helplessness, hopelessness, suicidal feeling and shame" after a rape, men are far more likely to react with anger and hostility than women.

"Over time," Stillerman writes, "they may also question their sexual identity, act out in a sexually aggressive manner, and even downplay the impact of the assault."

All survivors of rape, both male and female, should seek immediate help. Men, however, are often unaware of the many resources available to them. Virtually all communities have rape crisis centers, and most of these places have on-site counselors trained in working with male survivors or can refer men who have been assaulted to professionals in the area who can help.

A surprising friend

You sleepily sit down in class and dread the fact that you have to be sitting there yet again listening to that annoying professor ramble on about that class that you wish you hadn't signed up for. Unfortunately, you are stuck there for at least the rest of the class. Five minutes to go until class starts and fifty-five minutes to go until you can get out op there.

The door then opens and, as if your day wasn't already off to a perfect start, that annoying boy who walks in like he is on fire. He decides to make the most dramatic entrance possible. He sits down across the isle from you and places his bag on the floor. He drops dramatically into the chair next to his friend who happens to be a girl. Not surprisingly, right? Immediately, as if the world is about to end, he starts squealing on about his previous day and don't you look surprised when the wrists start flapping around like they're out of joint or something! He goes on about how his clothes almost didn't match his shoes and what a catastrophe that would have been. You look at him with the most non-understanding look that your face can possibly muster and wish to anyone listening that he would just go away.

You glance at his bag sitting in the isle and notice a button that says: "Drama Queen." That one sits right above the black button with the pink triangle on it. Hmmm. Using common sense and putting two and two together, you soon realize that this annoyance is also gay. What luck you are having! Its bad enough you are in class at 9:15 in the morning, but now for the next fifty minutes, you have to listen to him "fag out" as well. You close your eyes and pray that he'll just stop talking. Suddenly, you feel a tap on the shoulder and you open your eyes to him of all people standing over you. "Do you have a pencil?" he asks. Oh God! You politely reach in to your bag and take one out as you hand it to him. He thanks you and sits back down. Of all people he had to ask you! When will this day end? Just make it end! You casually glance over and notice him looking at you. Is he checking you out? Oh please say that he isn't! Should you get a pin that says "Straight all the way," so he's aware?

Paul Bilbo

Suddenly he gets back up and asks if he can talk to you after class. In complete confusion, you don't know what to say other than yes, even though you wish you could just duck out now and have the confrontation never happen. The professor walks in and suddenly you change modes and begin to focus on the lecture as it starts.

Fifty minutes later, the class is over and you realize what awaits you. As you get up, he is already standing next to you and begins to escort you outside. On the way out, he introduces himself as Tim and you shyly reply, "Kurt." He suddenly starts talking a million miles a second and asks what you think of the class. You reply that its all right, you just wish it wasn't so early in the morning. He agrees and begins making small talk about UMass and the horrendous food at the D.C. You laugh in agreement and still wonder what the point of the conversation is and will it be coming soon. He asks, "So, I don't mean to be blunt, but are you seeing anyone?" Oh my God! He is asking you out! What nerve he has! He doesn't even know if you're gay or not! You coldly reply that you are, but then make sure he gets the impression that you are straight. "I like girls, though." Suddenly he laughs and tells you that he is well aware of that. He claims to have something called "gay-dar" which you have no idea what that is, and aren't really sure that you care.

He says that the reason why he asks is that his friend from class, Alicia, was interested in you. He explains that it's kind of corny to ask for someone else, but that's what friends are for. You feel terribly embarrassed and apologize for your mistake. He tells you that its no problem and is actually surprised that you even stayed after to talk to him. "I can only imagine what you must think of me," he says. "Let me guess, a flaming queen who only knows about drama and clothes, right?" You defensively say no, but deep down, you know he is right. He tells you that he is used to it and has been getting it his whole life. You wonder what it must be like to be in his shoes and realize that you take for granted every day how lucky you are to be part of the majority in many ways. He tells you that he has to run, but gives you his number and tells you to think about Alicia, and if you have any questions, feel free to call him and hell help you out. You watch him go as he runs off towards the campus center.

As you walk away, you begin to think about Tim and how even though he is kind of annoying in his own respects, he seems genuinely nice and the fact that he'd do that for a friend shows that he's genuinely a nice guy and might be worth getting to know. Besides, its hard enough making solid friends with 25,000 people running around campus. Not to mention the fact that you are still single and Alicia was pretty cute. Maybe its time you open up and realize that it's a big world out there and people are all different and a friend is a friend regardless. Besides, rumor has it that gay guys can get the dirt on what girls are really like, so maybe he will be worthwhile after all.

You walk home with Tim's number in hand and think to yourself, friends come when you least expect them, and generally they aren't what you expect, but those are the ones that are the best surprise of all. Those are the ones that stick around for life and regardless of who they are, will always be true because they value the friendships they are given. People who used to think the way you did never give them a chance and now you realize what you were missing out on. So, who cares that he's gay. Love is better then hate no matter what the circumstance, and besides, who are you to judge anyone? Life is looking up all because you decided to stick around and talk to that gay boy from class. It's amazing what you can really learn in fifty minutes. No offense to the professors, though.

THE TRUTH ABOUT SAME-SEX RAPE

In support of Shepard killer's life sentence

On November 4, 1999, the trial of Aaron I. McKinney came to its dramatic end. McKinney, the second of two men on trial for the October 1998 murder of Matthew Shepard, was convicted of two counts of felony murder and sentenced to life imprisonment without the possibility of parole. The conviction made him eligible for the death penalty, but as the result of a deal made between the defense and the prosecution in the case, McKinney will not face death. Rather, he will spend the rest of his life in prison, wondering what he could have done differently to avoid the fate that he chose for himself. For agreeing to this deal, the prosecution, along with Shepard's parents, should be applauded.

Lawrence Mortensen

In his statement to the court after the sentencing took place, Dennis Shepard, Matthew's father, said, "I would like nothing better than to see you die, Mr. McKinney. However, this is the time to begin the healing process... Mr. McKinney, I'm going to grant you life, as hard as it is for me to do so, because of Matthew... Every time you wake up in that prison cell, remember that you had the opportunity and the ability to stop your actions that night." The deal that was struck between the prosecution and the defense ensures that justice will truly be served, and it does so in a number of ways.

McKinney's agreement to life without parole means that there will be no long appeals process. In cases where a defendant is sentenced to death, that defendant and his attorneys invariably appeal the decision, generally leading to more convictions and more appeals. This process would be harmful in a number of ways, not the least of which would be that the Shepard family would not receive their necessary closure for an incredibly long time. Another harmful result of the appeals process is the overall cost of the trials. In a study of the cost of capital cases in Texas, a death penalty case costs an average of $2.3 million, about three times the cost of imprisoning someone in a single cell at the highest security level for 40 years. In addition, by lengthening the process in such a way, Aaron McKinney would likely be kept in the public eye for far longer than is necessary, and possibly be turned into a "death-penalty martyr" for organizations that are opposed to capital punishment. Regardless of one's own feelings on the death penalty, it would be appalling if McKinney became a symbol for the need to end the death penalty. Now, there will be no chance for years of publicity, just a long and miserable existence.

As much as anyone might like to see Matthew Shepard's murderer die for the wrongs he committed, it is unclear what good would come of what is essentially legally sanctioned murder. If one suspends any religious beliefs about the afterlife and divine punishment, it seems completely illogical that McKinney should be allowed to end his prison term so quickly as may be allowed by killing him at the hands of the law. By living in prison for the rest of his natural life, we can be almost certain that every time he celebrates Christmas with his cellmate, watches fireworks on television on the Fourth of July, and eats his Thanksgiving dinner off of a tray in a prison cafeteria, he will regret that he did not stop himself from murdering a defenseless man on that cold, October night in 1998.

In his own statement to the court, Aaron McKinney is quoted as having said, "I really don't know what to say other than that I'm truly sorry to the entire Shepard family. Never will a day go by I won't be ashamed for what I have done." Whether any part of that statement can or should be believed is up for debate, but one thing is certain: thanks to his agreement to life imprisonment without parole, McKinney will one day regret his actions if he does not already. May Aaron McKinney have a long life ahead of him, and as Dennis Shepard said in his final statement to the court, may he thank Matthew every day for it.

This, writer Tzivia Gover's new romantic comedy, deals with a committed lesbian couple and the man who comes between them. The reading will take place at 4 p.m. in the Third Floor Theater, Thomes Marketplace, Northampton. Donations will be gratefully accepted.

Northampton resident and poet Janet Aalfts will read from Reach, her third collection of poetry at 2 pm in the Food for Thought Bookstore.

November 22
Jens Rydström, a co-author on a major new study on homosexuality in the city of Stockholm, Sweden, will be presenting "From Sinner to Citizen: An Overview of Swedish and Scandinavian Gay History." This lecture is a part of the Stonewall Center's LGBT Studies Lecture Series and will take place at 7pm in the Campus Center room 917.

No Pride Alliance meeting or Stonewall LGBT Lecture will be held this week.

November 30
Pride Alliance, the UMass GLBT and straight ally group, has its weekly meeting today at 7 p.m. Safe-sex issues will be discussed.

December 1
In remembrance of World AIDS Day, Clara Sala, a poet and activist who performs works dealing with HIV, race, and other issues, will perform in the Graduate Student Lounge in the Campus Center at 7:30 p.m. The show is co-sponsored by the Stonewall Center and the Health Education and Outreach Program – University Health Services.

December 2
Chuck Morrison, an assistant professor in Denison University's Communication Department, is presenting a lecture entitled "Red Herring and Rhetorical Imprints: J. Edgar Hoover's Sex Panics." The lecture is part of the Stonewall Center's LGBT Studies Lecture Series and will take place at 12:30 p.m. in Campus Center room 804-08.

All Of Us Are Created Equal, Right?
By Paul Bibo

As an infant with his small little hands and his tiny little toes,
The secret that lied within him is a secret that no one yet knows.
Parents look at him proudly.
Their perfect little angel was sent from above.
Their one and only son has now been given the gift of eternal parental love.
Such a handsome child raised the best way they that they knew how.
He may like dolls and not get the point of baseball,
but not to worry now.
With his big brown eyes and his jet-black hair, wait until the girls get a look!
"So then why does he play house and hopscotch?"
As the parents' heads shook.
Help me mom and dad! The boys are being mean and they call me an awful name.
I'm sure they're just being kids, my boy,
and I'm sure to them its just a game.
Faggot and queer and a little girl too,
the daily torment was oh-so-hard to bear.
Parents and teachers knew,
but no one seemed to notice and no one seemed to care.
He went through the torment, verbal abuse, and they hounded him day after day.
His confidence started to dwindle and his ability to fight back soon faded away.
He tried to remember that "words can never hurt you"
to help fill that empty hole.
But it seemed to be so wrong to him.
Why doesn't it say "words can shatter the soul?"
He knew deep down that he was gay and that there's nothing else that he could do.
No one would understand him, no one else was like him, and If there were, it was few.
How would he tell his parents? Would they understand?
Will they throw him out?
What is the big deal anyway? What's the difference?
What is all the hate about?
Its only who he chooses to love that makes him so misunderstood and feared.
Something that is beyond his control makes him sick, perverted, odd, and weird.
This boy ended his life the night after he told his parents that he was in fact gay.
His mom and dad stood there baffled and didn't have a clue as to what to say.
"I did not raise my son to choose to live that kind of life.
Not my son, no son of mine!"
I guess that eternal parental love did not last and their angelic son was not divine.
What a waste of a precious life because of people's lack of education and hate.
People don't understand that what they say and do can determine someone's fate.
So choose to be a bigot and speak out about your war against anti-hate laws.
Prejudice and bigotry and the people that hold these in them are in fact the cause.
We die by their hateful minds and they don't even bat an eye as if they're not to blame.
I just hope they soon realize that black or white and gay or straight.
We ARE all the same.
Understand that no one is perfect and we are all fighting stay afloat in this life state.
Take this boy for instance.
He died because love could not compensate for hate.
Don't be taken down and refuse to drown in others' misunderstandings or fears.
Turn a child's hate around and teach them that love is love and hate isn't worth the tears.

Canada OK's gay scouts

By Steve Pearlstein
Associated Press

In the United States, it is an issue that has roiled the national Boy Scout convention, divided churches and led to numerous lawsuits, including one now before the Supreme Court. Should homosexuals be allowed to participate in the Boy Scouts?

But in Canada, the prospect that the first gay scout troop will soon hold its first meeting here in Toronto has barely raised an eyebrow.

No petitions. No court battles. Not even a meeting of the Scouts Canada board of directors. In fact, according to a spokesman, the only reason that national headquarters got involved was because of media inquiries from the United States and the prospect that a fundamentalist preacher from Kansas would lead a protest Monday. The preacher never showed up – nor did protesters. The only ones who did show up were gay rights supporters.

In Canada, we are secure enough in our own identities and lifestyles that we don't have to try to impose them on others," Amelia Golden, a lawyer with the League of Human Rights of B'nai B'rith of Canada, told the small gathering.

The 129th Toronto Scouting Group is the brainchild of Bonte Minnema, a gay University of Toronto senior who was a scout until he was 14, earning BSA appealed the decision to the U.S. Supreme Court.

However, the BSA has been meeting resistance from its membership, which ordered a review of the no-gays policy at its most recent national convention. The United Methodist Church, which sponsors 15 percent of the troops in the United States, is deeply split over the issue, with the General Board of Church and Society having adopted a statement of "non-support" of the Boy Scouts because of its refusal to welcome gays.

Neil Nevitte, a professor of political science at the University of Toronto, said public opinion polls show that Canadians and Americans have similar levels of discomfort and disapproval about homosexuality. The difference, he said, is that while Americans act on those impulses publicly, and try to impose their beliefs on others, Canadians are more private about their views and inclined to take a live-and-let-live attitude.

DDT visits the Avalon

Canadian band mixes genres

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

DDT is a great new band from Canada that everyone will hopefully be hearing a lot more about in the future. But for right now, they are enjoying their opening slot on the current Megadeth tour, which invades the Avalon in Boston next Monday. Their style is best heard rather than described, but a lively mix of rock, funk and ska is just a taste of what to expect from the Vancouver-based five-piece. The Collegian recently had the opportunity to talk to singer Brian Howes, who was enthusiastic about the current tour and DDT's most recent release, Urban Observer.

DDT is completed by rapper/vocalist Corey Perry-White, drummer Bobby James, Dr. Dave on bass and guitarist Mike Mackay. The band's only prior release is the 1995 EP LOTGOOP. As far as the group's influences, Howes described an interesting variety.

"Seal to Slayer and everything in between," Howes explained, adding, "I'll be listening to a Faith Hill CD and then Machine Head right afterwards." DDT's diverse listening habits are akin to their genre free sound, which combines so many styles that one would think it may be alienating to the more metal-oriented sound of teammates Megadeth and Static X. But Howes speaks only of positive response thus far.

"The crowd reaction is always good, but there are always some people who no matter what will dislike us since we're different," Howes noted, and also stated that their drum solo, a former rock show staple that is now all but obsolete, usually wins most people over. In addition to the drum solo, fans can expect to see the band's "heavier, more grave side" due to their short set, which, according to Howes, will showcase mainly their "intense, upbeat songs."

One of more refreshing aspects of DDT's sound, in this wake of the current rock atmosphere, is that they have some strong messages in their lyrics, but still manage to keep a lighthearted tone. Howes describes it as "quite initial yet fun" and doesn't want the band to be preaching to people. The tracks on Urban Observer definitely reflect this attitude, like "Pistol Whip" and "AUDDT," which address powertripping music moguls and greedy corporations, but above all have a strong beat to find some great riffs. "I want people to draw their own conclusions from the songs, but above all have a good time."

Howes names a tour with the Red Hot Chili Peppers ideal, but recent tours have been no less fulfilling. "The tour with Kid Rock was amazing," adds Howes, and lists the concert stop at the Tsongas Arena in Springfield as a standout of the best crowd response. Hopefully that enthusiasm will again be present when DDT returns to Massachusetts next Monday, so make sure to get there early, as I show some support for this great band. And if you don't like them, blame Canada.

DDT will open for Megadeth and Static X at the Avalon in Boston on Monday, November 22. Concert begins at 7:30. Tickets may be purchased in advance through Ticketmaster by calling 617-931-2000 or visiting them on the web at www.ticketmaster.com.

TV movies a sorry, shallow lot

By Brian Lowry
Los Angeles Times

HOLLYWOOD — People in Hollywood love rooting for their brethren to fail, but some took particular glee as anemic ratings dribbled in last week for two heavily promoted miniseries, CBS' "Shake, Rattle & Roll" and NBC's "The Magical Legend of the Leprechauns."

Cheering loudest (if anonymously) were many TV veterans who have come to view the network made-for-TV movie with growing disenchantment. Some blame the federal government, maintaining that deregulation of television cleared the way for networks to run roughshod over independent producers, exercising a level of control over the $1-billion-a-year movie business that has helped homogenize the end product.

Nothing raises more ire among these dissidents than projects like the two aforementioned miniseries, which seem to place marketing ahead of material and promotional opportunities ahead of storytelling.

"Leprechauns" was merely the latest in a series of special-effects extravaganzas with which NBC has enjoyed remarkable ratings success, derision from TV critics notwithstanding. Unfortunately, this one appeared to have been ordered based on computer visuals and stunt casting (Whoopi Goldberg as the Grand Banshee!) without reading a script.

"Shake, Rattle & Roll" was a more insidious marketing enterprise, not only aping NBC's miniseries "The '60s" and "The Temptations" but designed to cash in on CBS' ownership of dozens of radio stations that could be used to promote both the miniseries and a CD tie-in.

Producers see equal creative bankruptcy in the "me too" mentality of multiple movies surfacing based on the same premise. This includes competing projects about "The Partridge Family," a pair on the life of Muhammad Ali, and a trio about Mary and Jesus, which will thus qualify as the greatest story ever told... and told... and told.

At the same time, major networks rarely demonstrate a willingness to explore truly daring territory, preferring to stick with instantly recognizable names and concepts.

Susan Lyne, executive vice president of movies and miniseries at ABC, summed up her strategy by saying: "Every single movie that I pick up has to be able to promote it in a 10-second promo." Small wonder so many future ABC films are biographies, including Ali, Audrey Hepburn, the Beach Boys and the Three Stooges.

Yet while the major networks cut back on movies — relying on series and newsmagazines to establish their "brand" cable networks are effectively using the genre to define themselves.

Showtime and TNT are following in Home Box Office's footsteps, garnering acclaim for such movies as "The Baby Dance" and "Pirates of Silicon Valley." Other channels — including MTV, VH1, A&E, even Nickelodeon — are expanding into this arena as well.

"Cable is doing provocative, quirky types of movies that you can't do anywhere else," said producer Dan Paulson, whose latest Showtime film, "Gift of Love: The Daniel Huffman Story," premieres Sunday. "In features, you're making movies for 16- to 26-year-old males. Cable is a haven for more sensitive, intelligent movies."

"Gift of Love" does have a teen-age boy in it, but instead of being dismembered by a supernatural killer, he donates a kidney to save his ailing grandmother, played by Debbie Reynolds. It's the kind of movie that doesn't provide whiz-bang effects for a promo, a trait indicative of Paulson's last Showtime effort, "A Cooler Climate," a middle-aged "chick flick" with Sally Field and Judy Davis.

HBO, the winner of seven consecutive Emmys for outstanding movie, keeps charting its own novel path. Next year's lineup, for example, includes "The Last of the Blonde Bombshells," starring Dame Judi Dench, Sir Ian Holm and Leslie Caron, hardly a marquee destined to bring out the "I Know What You Did Last Summer" crowd.

"They'll take chances, that's the great thing," Paulson said regarding the pay channels. "They don't rely on ratings, and they don't have to open with a huge box-office weekend."

In the eyes of some, the freedom to employ such an art-house approach makes comparisons between network and cable fare amount to apples and oranges.

"Cable is niche programming," said Howard Braunstein, whose company produces movies ranging from the networks to VH1's recent Ricky Nelson biography. "They can play directly to their identity."

Premium services can also undertake topics broadcasters shun. HBO's "If These Walls Could Talk II" will examine the lesbian experience in America, after the first "Walls" tackled abortion. Having broken ground with movies about homosexuality ("That Certain Summer"), AIDS ("An Early Frost") and incest ("Something About Amelia"), the major networks generally avoid such themes today, fully aware that many advertisers grow skittish at the mere whiff of controversy.

This tide has inspired some producers to take refuge in less turbulent waters. Marian Rees, whose 10 "Hallmark Hall of Fame" productions include the Emmy-winning "Love Is Never Silent," fled to public television, where she is turning such classic stories as Willa Cather's "The Song of the Lark" and Langston Hughes' "Cora Unashamed" — into movies that will air next year as part of a new "American Collection" on "Masterpiece Theatre."

"At the networks, it's very tough for all of us who try to tell stories," said Rees, who formed a nonprofit entity, American Literature on Television, to oversee the projects. "The question now is not what is the story, but a demographic discussion about who is the audience. ... The shifts are all toward how to maximize a global market."

Although newer venues have created some hope, the TV movie will remain a source of frustration until the networks determine its place for them in a 200-channel world. In the interim, if the coming onslaught of biblical epics succeeds brace yourself for "Judas: Before the Kiss" and "Dark Apostle: The Untold Story of Judas." They don't exist yet, but should one become a reality, the other is almost certain to follow.

The Messenger: The Story of Joan of Arc
Playing at Showcase Cinemas

The emotion of Joan of Arc may go deeper than that pointless sci-fi flick Take Saving Private Ryan's gore subtract Tom Hanks' passion then strip away any sense of purpose and the remnants make up this dull hearted wartime drama. I sat through two and a half hours of this movie and not once did I ever remotely care about what happened to any of the characters. The movie is a complete mess and should have been burned at the stake before being released.

Dogma
Playing at Showcase Cinemas

Matt Damon and Ben Affleck play Loki and Bartleby, a pair of angel whom God has cast out of heaven. The angels have found a loophole in God's decree which should allow them reentrance to Heaven. To succesfully contradict the word of God, however, would be to disprove her infallibility and if Loki and Bartleby go through with their plan, all of existence would undo itself. Dogma spends a lot of time taking stabs at Catholicism as an example of how worthwhile religious ideals can be lost in a sea of doctrine and petty church fragmentation
B+ (David Troupes)

The Insider
Playing at Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield

The Insider is a decidedly hard edge look at the world a story of morals and ethics that wouldn't work without great acting and superb direction. Fortunately the movie has both. Despite the presence of Al Pacino, this is Russell Crowe's movie. Director Michael Mann (Heat, Last of the Mohicans) paints such a bleak, no frill landscape that The Insider comes off as a good documentary.
B+ (Adam Martignetti)

The Bone Collector
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

The Bone Collector is a crime thriller which plays out like nearly every other crime thriller, but which displays enough talent to hold our attention for two hours. Don't expect anything mind shattering, but if you're in the mood for a solid hunt down the killer movie, The Bone Collector may be worth your while.
B- (David Troupes)

American Beauty
Playing at Pleasant St. Theater

American Beauty takes a fascinating look at the afflictions to be found in middle class culture, the neurotic human drama that potentially plays out behind every white picket fence in America. Beyond providing us with so many colorful, intoxicating characters, American Beauty has a lot to say about American Culture. Materialism, homophobia, the innocence and non innocence of youth, and the hypocritical nature of American ideals are all present, woven into the characters' internal struggles. A magnificent script is brought to life by wonderful directing and a flawlessly talented cast; this is truly one of the best films of the year.
A (David Troupes)

Double Jeopardy
Playing at Showcase Cinemas,

Double Jeopardy takes its incredibly lame-sounding name from the legal institution by which someone cannot be tried for the same crime twice. Except for a few instances of humor and a handful of scenes that approached being suspenseful, this movie is barely worth the $3.50 for a Blockbuster rental. Instead, stare at an Ashley Judd poster for a while, and then watch U.S. Marshalls.
C- (David Troupes)

The Sixth Sense
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

The Sixth Sense lies somewhere between psychologically intense realism and science fiction, slowly opening the viewer's eyes to a singularly bizarre arrangement. Bruce Willis gives a surprisingly solid lead performance as Dr. Malcolm Crowe, a clinical psychologist specializing in children, reminding us that he's not restricted to movies like Armageddon and The Fifth Element. Crowe becomes involved with Cole, a troubled young boy who confides in Crowe that he can see dead people.

The first shall be last... And the last shall be the first? Either way, my fingers are crossed for the end of this animated atrocity. Truthfully, I have never laid eyes on the flick so this review is purely speculative, but its about a yellow rat that lives in a ball, how good could it be?

Story of Jewish family

By Kenneth Turan
Los Angeles Times

HOLLYWOOD – For writer-director Barry Levinson, Liberty "Heights" is one from the heart.

The fourth film to be set in his native Baltimore (following "Diner," "Tin Men" and "Avalon"), this is a mature, accomplished piece of work, both funny and deeply felt, personal cinema of the best kind. Older now, seeing more, understanding more but caring just as much, Levinson has made the memory film we always hoped he would.

Although its focus on Baltimore's Jewish community in the fall of 1954 couldn't be more specific, the issues and themes "Liberty Heights" raises, its focus on the dreams, diversions and disappointments of an increasingly multicultural America, have a universal taste of life about them.

Levinson has done this, ironically, by embracing specificity, by having characters (unlike those in "Avalon," who never mention their Jewishness) proudly screaming out car windows as they drive from their Liberty Heights neighborhood into a Gentile area. "Get ready, folks, Jews are coming."

For Baltimore in 1954 was still a place where you could divine a person's religion and ethnicity by asking where they lived. But the Supreme Court had just desegregated the schools, barriers of all kinds were breaking down, and the reality of a more open America was beckoning everyone, even Nate and Ada Kurtzman (Joe Mantegna and Bebe Neuwirth) and their sons Van and Ben (Adrien Brody and Ben Foster).

"Liberty Heights" is at its funniest exposing the contours of the Kurtzmans' doomed all-Jewish world, complete with an irascible old-country grandmother (Frania Rubinek), who insists "if it's in the Bible, it's for a reason." And what specifically might that reason be? "A good reason."

Reading from a school essay describing his still younger years, Ben recounts (and we hilariously see) his confusion at coming across Wonder bread at a small friend's house. "Everything was white, there's too much white stuff," he wails to his mother, who nods and says ominously of the visited family, "They're the other kind."

Although Ben, now in high school, has already learned that 99 percent of the world is not "Jewish," there's a lot he and the college-going Van don't know about what it's like to be the "other kind." For both brothers, forbidden romance will aid in the getting of wisdom, and "Liberty Heights" expertly intertwines their stories with another cross-cultural difficulty, one their father has managing his unconventional business.

The world and, more importantly, the IRS, think the source of Nate Kurtzman's income is a collapsing burlesque house on Baltimore's famous Block. But it actually comes from the numbers business, a gambling enterprise so beyond the pale it's never even mentioned at home. Desperate to drum up more customers, Nate and his associates come up with a bonus system, but when a small-time black drug dealer named Little Melvin (Orlando Jones) hits his number big, Nate faces a crisis that taxes even his considerable toughness and ingenuity.

Ben, meanwhile, has become fascinated with Sylvia (Rebeka Johnson), the only black student in his homeroom. The daughter of a prominent surgeon, elegant and self-possessed, Sylvia is not only a world away from Little Melvin, she is a world away from Ben as well.

Still, despite opposition from both sets of parents — her father has a rule against white boyfriends and his mother simply says, "Just kill me now!" — Ben and Sylvia find themselves really liking each other and wanting to spend time together.

Theirs is the sweetest of friendships, even extending to a joint visit to a lovingly re-created James Brown concert, but like everything else about "Liberty Heights," it manages to be clear-eyed and unsentimental as well as warm. Both Ben and his friends have accumulated considerable prejudice, old wives' tales and just plain ignorance and misinformation about blacks (not to mention about sex, but that's another story), which this relationship gracefully and often amusingly disabuses him of.

Van's romantic entanglement is just as forbidden. At a Halloween party in a Gentile neighborhood, while his friend Yussel (David Krumholtz) is getting into a bravado-induced fight for refusing to admit he's Jewish, dark and poetic-looking Van gets intoxicated with Dubbie (model Carolyn Murphy), a kind of ultimate shiksa goddess who is involved with a wealthy fellow socialite named Trey (Justin Chambers) who drinks too much and drives too fast.

The experienced Brody ("King of the Hill," "Summer of Sam") brings a fine poetic grace to the part of Van, and it is a tribute to Levinson's sensitive direction (and Ellen Chenoweth's adroit casting) that he gets equally strong performances out of the film's numerous first-time feature actors, including Foster, Johnson, Murphy, Chambers and Jones. Not even born when this film takes place, they've managed to recapture its nuances with remarkable fidelity.

But it's Levinson who's given them such rich and often comic things to say, who understands how to structure great riffs that seem to come out of nowhere. So we have Ben and his pals, faced with a sign reading "No Jews, Dogs or Colored," wondering how Jews got the first position, or Yussel's tirade about anti-Semitism. "They all pray to a Jew," he fumes. "I guess it's OK to have a dead Jew hanging over your bed but not to have one come in the front door."

Levinson's storytelling style has always been on the discursive side, and "Liberty Heights," ebbing and flowing like a river of memory, shows that technique to its best advantage. There's almost a tie-form quality to the narrative as stories weave in and out of one another, meandering a bit but never losing their novelistic grasp of feeling and atmosphere.

Aiding in the creation of that atmosphere is an eclectic soundtrack (from the Midnighters' "Annie Had a Baby" to Mandy Patinkin singing the Yiddish classic "Mein Shtetele Belz") that is a living presence in the film to the fine work of the film's production talents. These include previous Levinson collaborators Stu Linder (editor) and Vincent Peranio (production designer) as well as the brilliant Hong Kong-based cinematographer Chris Doyle, a master of color and mood.

Although the film's advertising tag line ("You're Only Young Once, but You Remember Forever") sells it that way, "Liberty Heights" is hardly an exercise in simple nostalgia. Strains of darkness, pain and regret are visible through the comedy, and some of the societal/racial issues the film brings up have yet to be resolved. "A lot of images fade," Ben says at one point. "If I knew things would no longer be, I would have tried to remember better." Barry Levinson thankfully, has remembered enough for us all.

Columbia, St. John's storm Amherst

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

The magic number for today is five.

No, we are not talking about the number of days it took heavyweight boxer Peter McNeeley to ramble off the statement, "I'll be back," after being pummeled in his fight with Mike Tyson.

We are talking about a possible five wins in a row.

As the University of Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team heads into competition this weekend, there is only one thing on their mind. That is, they are looking to have a five game winning streak under their belt by Sunday evening.

The Minutemen are off to an exceptional start. In their past three events, they have outscored their opponents by a combined 178 points. In laymen's terms, they have been on a winning rampage as of late. With two wins this weekend, UM could up their undefeated record to five wins and no losses.

Don't worry. This is in no way a jinx.

The team is looking towards this weekend by focusing on one opponent at a time. The Minutemen realize that at any given meet, they could be challenged in any given event. They will have to defend their own waters twice in the next two days as they wrap up their three meet home stand.

Tomorrow at 1 p.m., UM will host the Red Storm of St. John's at the Joseph R. Rogers, Jr., Pool in the Boyden Building. On Sunday, they will find themselves in the aquatic pit again as they host the Columbia Lions at the same time. Admission to both meets is free.

With the swimming assault of freshman Tommy Keane, juniors Chris Arsenault and Billy Brown, and the balanced diving attack of senior Ed Hefferon and junior Jason Ely, the Minutemen bring a balanced and confident squad to the swimming pool.

As of Saturday, Chris Arsenault retains best times in six events for the team. The list includes the 100- and 200-yard freestyle, the 100- and 200-yard backstroke, the 200-yard fly and the 200 individual medley.

Keane times in best in the five hundred and one thousand freestyle. Brown leads in both legs of the breaststroke, along with the 400-yard individual medley.

Sophomore Carlos Ramos has the best time in the 100-yard fly while Henry Turner leads in the 50-yard freestyle event. Ed Hefferon leads all of the statistical diving categories.

Coach Russ Yarworth is in his 20th year as director of the UM aquatics program. Yarworth began coaching the men's varsity swimming and diving team in the 1979-80 season and added the duty of coaching the Minuteman water polo program in 1987.

The current success of the 1999-2000 swimming and diving program is hardly unexpected. In coach Yarworth's previous nineteen seasons, the men's swimming and diving team has compiled a remarkable 169-43 (.797) dual-meet record and has captured three-straight Atlantic 10 crowns to go along with the eight consecutive New England Championships won from 1987-1994. The Minutemen have posted six undefeated dual-meet seasons under Yarworth. Last year, the team threw up a 10-0 mark.

UM hopes zero stays against SJU

By Matt Crocker

St. John's University is going to have to be cooler than Sugar Bear this weekend, since the Minutewomen cannot get enough of those winning ways and plan to spoon out a win against the looming Red Storm.

Getting their daily allowance of a complete breakfast, the University of Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team are currently on a four-meet winning streak. Leaving all other teams in their wake this season, UMass has been a dominant force in and above the water, earning victories against New Hampshire, Central Connecticut State, Boston University, and Northeastern.

Yet, the Red Storm is no stranger to victory over the Minutewomen as the Johnnies rolled over the Maroon and White last season, beating UMass 152-89 and handing UM their first loss of the year. Oddly enough, the Red Storm will enter this weekend facing the same situation as they did last year. UMass once again is undefeated and a win for St. John's will duplicate the scenario seen at last season's meeting.

Despite a slight case of deja vu when viewing the stats and at the opening of the meet, those may be the only times the Red Storm will see similarities to the UM defeat scene of last year.

A team comprised of powerful swimmers in every event, UMass will not just be a hard team for St. John's to beat, the Minutewomen would be a hard team for anyone to beat.

Senior Elizabeth Risotto has owned the backstroke competition, winning the 100-yard backstroke in two out of the last four meets and the 200-yard backstroke in three out of the last four. She was the only swimmer for UMass to win both her events against Boston University last weekend and she set a pool record against Central Connecticut earlier this season.

Sophomore Anne Detloff has also been strong for the Minutewomen. Detloff took home the 100-yard freestyle against Boston University last weekend, but had her best meet this season against Northeastern when she reigned supreme in the 200 and 500-yard freestyle events.

Detloff is also a member of one of the relay teams that has outswam the competition this season. In the last two meets against Northeastern and BU, the relay teams have been a key component in the victory. Against Northeastern, both the 400-yard freestyle and 200-yard medley teams were victorious and against B.U. the 200-yard freestyle went first and third to UMass to help secure a come from behind win.

Not to be outdone, the diving team with freshman Kate Allery and junior Robin Velona have broken the chlorinated water surface many times this season with dives that have both impressed the judges and added points to the UMass meet score.

UM will face St. John's at 1:00 p.m. on Saturday at the Joseph R. Rogers Jr. pool in Boyden Gym. Following the meet, the Minutewomen get a two-week break before heading to Syracuse in early December for the Syracuse Invitational.

They get their shot at UConn a week later.

Men's gym ready to roll

It has been a nice long break, but the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team is ready to start its competition season once again.

The Minutemen will be having their annual intrasquad meet tomorrow, November 20 at 7 p.m. in Boyden Gymnasium. It's UMass versus UMass, as the team is broken down into two squads going head-to-head, ultimately to prove who's got what it takes to become part of the 12 man lineup for the UMass Open on December 4.

Last year, the gym team made it's first-ever appearance at the NCAA East Regional, reclaimed the title of ECAC Champion, long held by Temple University and produced a four-peat All-American.

They have some big shoes to fill, but with the talent of veteran athletes like Senior Jeff LaVallee and Junior J.J. Hershey along with the new blood of freshmen Justin Hammar, Brett Nelligan and Ben Jacobs, tomorrow night should only be the beginning of some great things to come from this team.

For Blake's sake; QB looking for out

By Brent Jones
Baltimare Sun

As if being 1-9 and having a coach fighting for his job aren't enough hardships, the Cincinnati Bengals can also throw into the mix a disgruntled starting quarterback who is counting the weeks until free agency.

That would be Jeff Blake, who regained his job the past two games after losing it to rookie Akili Smith in the fifth week.

"I've been on a roller coaster the last two years, and I'm still here for some reason," said Blake, who becomes a free agent at the end of this season.

Is he looking to stay in Cincinnati?

"I got six weeks left, then I'll be a free agent," Blake said.

Do they want him back in Cincinnati?

"I'd love to have him back," said Bengals Coach Bruce Coslet, who is 18-33 since taking over the club in 1996. "I don't know if that is going to be possible. He'll be a free agent, and we paid Akili Smith all this money."

So for now Blake is a lame-duck quarterback preparing to face the league's co-No. 1 defense in the Ravens on Sunday. Compile the team's losing record with going from being the starting quarterback in the 1996 Pro Bowl to backing up a rookie this season, and Blake's attitude becomes more understandable.

Blake threw for 3,822 yards, 28 touchdowns and 17 interceptions during the 1995 season for the Bengals. He led the AFC in touchdown passes and was second to John Elway in yardage.

He was the No. 2 vote-getter at quarterback behind Dan Marino, who missed the Pro Bowl because of injury.

That is not something Blake is reminiscing about now.

"Every week is a proving ground for me," Blake said. "Because if it wasn't, then I wouldn't be going through this roller coaster thing I've been going through. Every week I have to prove myself regardless of Pro Bowls, regardless of the touchdown/interception ratio I have, regardless of the things I've done."

Now he is proving himself to other teams in the league. It is a chance Blake probably would not have had if Smith did not go down with turf toe three weeks ago. Since then, Blake completed 18 of 32 passes for 236 yards and a touchdown last week against Tennessee, and passed for 287 yards and a touchdown the previous week against Seattle.

Blake has played himself in and out of the starting role since that Pro Bowl year. He started all 16 games in 1996, passing for 3,624 yards, with 24 touchdowns and 14 interceptions.

But the next season, Blake lost his job to Boomer Esiason. He stayed on the bench for most of last season behind Neil O'Donnell. He entered this season the No. 1 quarterback but the Bengals scored 10 or less points in three of their first four games prompting the benching.

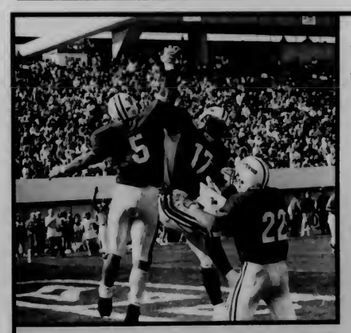
The biggest problem Coslet said Blake has had during the past few seasons and this year is consistency. Part of the blame, however, falls on the offensive line.

"We're starting four guys that we didn't start last year on our offensive line," Coslet said. "Our line has not come together."

Still, Blake was not making the plays in those first four starts that he had in the past.

"We weren't scoring, we weren't getting it done, and we wanted to see if (Smith) could spark the offense," Coslet said. "That's moot now because he's hurt.

"Blake has done all right. He's made some plays, but he's missed on some plays, too. I think Jeff is probably just like everyone else on our team, a little inconsistent.



"He can only do so much. The offensive line has to play better. We have to get a running game to complement Jeff so we can do our plays action."

Blake has the weapons that have made him successful in the past. Running back Corey Dillon is coming off back-to-back 1,000-yard seasons and he still has Pro Bowl receiver Carl Pickens and Darnay Scott, who have been with him his whole time in Cincinnati.

Those four have made big plays in the past. So what's the difference this season? "I haven't been on the field," Blake said.

Actually, he has been on the field for six games.

"We've had a lot of penalties, too," said Blake, who spent two seasons with the Jets before going to Cincinnati. "That's been bringing us back. I throw a TD to Darnay or we have a big play on a screen pass, we get called for holding. We've made big plays, but they never recorded because of penalties."

Senior trio says goodbye to UM volleyball

By James Piehl
Collegian Staff

This weekend the Massachusetts volleyball team members are truly the controllers of their own Atlantic 10 destinies. If they win, then they're in the Atlantic 10 Championship tournament. If they lose, they head home for Thanksgiving to reflect on a season that could have been over turkey and pie.

At 7pm tonight, the Minutewomen take their sixth place 9-7 conference record on the court to battle Virginia Tech, who stands at 8-8. UMass is 15-12 overall but lost earlier in the year to the below .500 Hokies (9-17).

Several things differ in the upcoming match from the last meeting. The season is at a close and seniors see the end of collegiate careers approaching which can increase the competitive fires. The Rage will be back in the Cage and home is always more comfortable than on the road. UM's back is to the conference wall if it wants to make something substantial out of the season. What better way to end this season than 17-12 and a berth in the A-10 Championship tournament?

That doesn't simply mean UMass has to beat sub-par VTech but they'll have to drop fourth-ranked George Washington in order to complete the scenario.

The Colonials carry 10-6 conference and 15-9 overall records onto the court at 7pm on Saturday against the Minutewomen. In UM's favor, one of GW's losses was suffered at UM's hands in Washington D.C. in a 3-2 slugfest.

Can the stage be set any more perfectly for the Minutewomen?

Not only has UM's offense come alive of late with the emergence of future phenom Rebecca Hasson, but the squad also boasts the terrific senior tandem of Kari Hogancamp and Jill Meyers.

The Dynamic Duo of volleyball hardly needs any more motivation for conference play, but factor in that it could be their last chance at the postseason crown and you have a hotbed for potential offense.

Hogancamp has led the UM squad and the conference in digs from the beginning of the season, and for the past seven weeks she's also led the nation averaging 5.22 per game. The Huntington Beach native also holds second place on the team in kills averaging 3.50 per game.

Meyers' stellar season of breaking records continues unabated as she receives another honor. Meyers was named to the GTE Academic All-District I volleyball team by the College Sports Information Directors of America. An honor only doled out to six student-athletes in the New York/New England region, which also makes them eligible for the national GTE Academic All-America Team.

Meyers ranks in the top five on fifteen career Minutewomen lists which include first in kills, total blocks, block assists, and matches with double-figure kills. This season she leads the squad in kills averaging 4.34 per game while ranking second in digs with 3.37 per game. Her best average though is probably her 3.84 cumulative grade point average.

The Minutewomen will need an entire team effort to close out senior weekend and the season big. With all the cards they hold, UM has the chance to take volleyball to place it hasn't been since 1996 – the Atlantic 10 Championships. Even if they lose, Hogancamp and Meyers' names will echo through the annals of UMass volleyball history untarnished.

Along with two other seniors, Jill Meyers bids the Cage adieu, closing the books on a storied career which has her at or near the top in many statistical categories.

Reschedule When Final Exams are Missed

SNOW DAYS

In order to reschedule final exams in case of snow, two alternate exam periods have been devised. They are 6:30 pm and 8:45 pm each exam day. The use of these alternative periods in the event of closings is outlined below. In addition, the academic calendar includes Thursday December 23, as an official snow day in the event that the University is closed December 22. This policy goes into effect ONLY if the University is officially closed. The snow day "hot line" is 545-3030. If the University is open, all exams are expected to take place as scheduled. Each faculty member should inform his or her class of the planned time and location of the rescheduled final exam in the event of a snow day. All rescheduled exams will be held in the same location as published in the final exam schedule.

If the University is closed until 10:30 am:		1:30 pm	rescheduled to 8:30 pm next exam day
8:00 am	rescheduled to 6:30 pm same day	4:00 pm	rescheduled to 8:45 pm next exam day

Heavyweight snorefest headlined by British boaster

By Shaun Powell
Newsday

NEW YORK – The new champ didn't crack any hilarious jokes Wednesday. Nor did he recite catchy poetry, talk much smack or sing any songs. There was no entourage around, nor Don King. He wore no gaudy jewelry, no Versace either, and while his hair was in braids, they were neatly tucked in a ponytail.

Lennox Lewis gave no reason to love or loathe him. Basically, he came to town and did nothing to make anyone notice him.

His chat to promote HBO's upcoming replay of last Saturday's fight was not a performance. He heard questions, he gave answers. It was very simple and plain, just like the man and the boxer.

In almost any other era, Lewis would be a refreshing change from the norm, a fighter who goes about his business and leaves his image to his fists. Except these aren't ordinary days for the sport. These are desperate times.

Boxing, especially the heavyweight division, needs a champ with a dynamic personality and style both in and out of the ring, a champ with enough charm to sell tickets, and most importantly, someone with more pull than Mike Tyson. Boxing needs Viagra, not Sominex.

Instead, the undisputed heavyweight champ is Pete Sampras.

If Lewis were running for president, he'd be Bill Bradley, a nice enough guy who seems qualified for the job yet doesn't exactly quicken the pulse. Lewis, 34, fought courageously against Evander Holyfield, whom he beat twice, which officially counted as once, and therefore deserves all the spoils coming his way. Nobody should have any problem with that. Even being a British champ in an American sport doesn't bother me.

It's just that boxing could use so much more than Lewis can offer. The man holding the most glamorous title in the game is helpless to save it. He can't stir it, revitalize it, or be a dazzling part of it. All Lewis can do for boxing is try like hell to keep Tyson from taking back the belts.

The problem, therefore, lies more with the state of the sport than it does with Lewis. He's about the best there is, and that's sad. There are twice as many boxing organizations as heavyweight contenders, and nobody except Tyson who can draw. The field may be the weakest and most anonymous in decades, maybe ever.

"They're all about even," conceded Lewis. "Maybe a couple stand out. In everybody's mind, everybody's a challenger. But I would think that there's only a few."

Next up for Lewis could be Michael Grant, no relation to Horace or Harvey. Grant is one of those fighters made for ESPN. He wouldn't make you subscribe to HBO to see him, much less spend 50 bucks on pay-per-view. Even Lewis couldn't sell anyone on Grant Wednesday.

"He's big," Lewis said with a shrug. "He's up and coming. He hasn't been through what I've been through, though."

If not Grant, then maybe Andrew Golota, the fighter who makes opponents reach for their groin, lest they reach a high note. But Lewis destroyed Golota in the first round of their 1997 fight. Shannon Briggs doesn't have a solid body of work as a serious threat. Holyfield could be persuaded to keep going at age 37, except it might be a waste of time, because Lewis gives him as much trouble as he gave Tyson.

Oh, yes. Tyson.

He just won't go away. He's hardly the puncher he once was, nor is he feared, and yet he remains marketable because of a lame group of pretenders chasing the belts. People will pay just to see what Tyson does to turn the night into a disaster. People will put money on Tyson before Briggs or Golota or Henry Akinwande.

That's why – surprise, surprise – Lewis said he wants Tyson.

"It's the one fight I want," he said. "That's the most exciting fight out there now. He's a boxer of my era whom I think everybody would want to see us fight. They want to know, is Tyson still the man he used to be?"

Lewis then answered his own question.

"He had the right moves before the trials and tribulations took over, which made him kind of weaker, you know? I think I'm a superior boxer. And I don't really have that much problem fighting smaller people."

There is one wild card in the bunch. Roy Jones Jr. is a man without a rival, a champ among many champs and, unfortunately for boxing, a middleweight trying to be a heavyweight.

That's how shoddy the division is. It needs help from below.

"I think he's giving up a lot," Lewis said. "He's not used to being a heavyweight. We hit much harder. It's not going to be easy."

Nothing comes easy for boxing. Lewis even had a struggle just to get his belt from the IBF, which hesitated after a fee dispute. But midway through his news conference yesterday, an IBF representative arrived with a briefcase. Lewis opened it, pulled out the package inside, and placed it next to the three other belts spread over a small table.

Finally, boxing has units.

"There should always be one heavyweight champion," Lewis said.

Boxing also has a noble heavyweight to call champ.

"I'm just basically myself," said Lewis, "and myself isn't such a bad fellow."

But boxing is still lacking in the area of its greatest need: It just isn't compelling anymore.

Jets with Ray of hope after harsh misfortune leaves them QB-less

By Steve Jacobson
Newsday

All right. Now what does Ray Lucas do for an encore, an encore, an encore, an encore? You might say that sounds a like broken record but hardly anybody of the age to be playing professional football knows how a broken record sounds.

So we will have to see Lucas play quarterback well enough, often enough and long enough to know if what he did Monday night was the beginning of something good. That's Bill Parcells' warning: a lot of quarterbacks have had a good day and nobody ever heard from them again. Except that Parcells sees Lucas the way a music teacher hears an unpolished voice or a modeling agent looks through smudges of ashes on the cheeks and sees a pretty face.

Lucas is Parcells' Cinderella, the raw talent he brought from New England as soon as he could. Back when Vinny Testaverde was a fresh woe-is-me and the season not yet rubble, the coach pondered the new Rick Mirer, who had some experience, and Lucas, who the coach really wished was prepared for the situation.

"Ray just sees the game different from other people," Parcells said. "You just do not throw that away. A lot of guys talk about competitiveness; this guy has it."

The old coach in Parcells said he's telling Lucas the things that lie in his way. "There's a greater chance they'll get in his way," Parcells said, judging from the long list of those who failed. A coach or a manager or an editor can watch a hopeful and it's rarely clear he'll ever make the grade but sometimes a light behind the eyes says he has a chance.

Parcells has his own kind of definition of character in a player. In Lucas, it comes from a willingness to play the wide receiver position and to work in the pinball machine of special teams to play football. Parcells acknowledges the end of his coaching time isn't many seasons off but Lucas' mentality flips Parcells' switches on, even across the generation gap.

Sometimes an old player whose ears Parcells singed will come back and thank the coach for making him better. "What makes a difference is, if you did something for someone and they knew it," Parcells said. "If Ray can succeed, I'll take a great deal of satisfaction."

Back with New England, Parcells signed this undrafted fellow from that noted Rutgers quarterback factory and had him play the position with the scout team, which is where hot prospects learn the job. And, as Parcells recalled, the assistant coaches laughed at such sport.

Today, Jets players are saying they like the feeling of Lucas at quarterback and never were comfortable with Mirer. Of course, the Jets won at New England Monday night with Lucas. They played with the great emotional lift of scoring first and when the Patriots came right back with the kickoff, they got a big play to stop the return at 95 yards and then made a nifty goal-line stand. Great lift but then Lucas had to do something with the lift.

Not that he was Johnny Unitas but he thrust himself into the position for the rest of the season and made himself the heir apparent. That could be Parcells' legacy.

Unless Lucas doesn't have an encore, an encore ... a Parcells quarterback has to be there as Phil Simms was and Drew Bledsoe was.

Testaverde, who played a dozen seasons before becoming an overnight success with the Jets, is 36. He tries to pass on the psychological aspects of how to be a quarterback. Remember, the back up always is the most popular player in town and Lucas now is the talk of the town. Ah, but what about Buffalo this coming Sunday? The test is not how he plays when he's playing well.

"It's when you lose and you know you were a big part of the reason for it," Parcells said. "The coaches are yelling at you. Your teammates look at you. The fans are booing you. The media says you're not worth a damn. That takes you down. You have to be man enough to understand. He understands. I have given him examples. I'll name 20 names who haven't been able to do that, guys you know, guys you've heard of."

He cited the No. 1 drafts who had "no guts" and the ones who "came from nothing" and earned everything. "Can you deal with the scrutiny? Until you get that turtle shell... There are ones who can handle it and ones who go in the tank. The same is true for coaches."

Tom Tupa, the punter who was the veteran quarterback in line when Testaverde went down, reads the situation from a few lockers down from Lucas. "You see guys, especially young ones, who have a good year and then they have a bad year and they're done," Tupa said. Then can't stop thinking about the bad year or the bad game or the bad play.

"You have to play mind games," Tupa said. "You have to learn from your mistakes but you have to forget your mistakes. Ray has that from special teams."

Lucas had Monday Night TV scrutiny against the team that had cut him and that coach in that stadium. He had his day after in the spotlight Wednesday he was not available to the media. It's a Parcells tactic to say enough.

Who knows what would have been if Parcells had made Lucas the backup in training camp and he was ready to step in directly. Parcells doesn't know where Lucas is at this point. "I even thought it's been a four-year journey for him, the real journey is just beginning," the coach said.

"He fought to get the bat in his hand, now he's in the batter's box. He had to fight to get into the dugout. Now can he get a hit?"

And does he have an encore?

Horoscopes

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Love and romance are indeed favored today, but you must be willing to make time for such "distractions." Actually, they're key elements right now.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Someone you know is likely to "save the day" today by providing just exactly what you need in the nick of time. Don't hold back your thanks!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Work will be more important to you today than in the recent past, and it will seem as though your responsibilities are multiplying.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You can be enjoying only the best today, but it may be difficult to persuade a rival that you are the one who should be favored at this time.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You may be attracted by something unusual today, and then led into a series of adventures that could teach you a great deal about life.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You may uncover a plot of sorts today designed to overshadow your own efforts and discredit you in some manner. Be fair with your rivals.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Now is no time to blame others for your own insecurities. Someone is trying to work with you. Are you making it much too difficult?

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Sincerity and a willingness to listen when the time comes will be the keys to your success today. Complications may arise during the evening.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – The solution to a particularly tricky mystery is likely to come to you today at the most unusual time. Be ready to come to the rescue!

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You'll receive an important tip today from someone who, not long ago, was in exactly the position you find yourself in right now. Listen up!

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You're going to want to get to the heart of the matter as quickly and efficiently as possible today. Avoid being emotional, and cut through red tape.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – Your vivid imagination is likely to open doors for you during the day, but after dark you may actually get your self in a little trouble.

It always seems to come back to the Huskies.

The Massachusetts football team's season first went on the line six weeks ago, when the Minutemen were 1-3 and preparing to host Northeastern. One more loss would knock the defending NCAA Division I-AA National Champions out of the playoff picture in only the season's fifth week.

UMass destroyed its cross-state neighbors by a commanding 77-0 margin, and hasn't lost since. This Saturday, its arch-rival, Connecticut, will come to Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium to try and ruin on the Minutemen and White parade.

UConn currently out of postseason possibilities at 4-6 overall and 3-4 in the Atlantic 10 Conference, played the spoiler in a similar spot last year, handing the Minutemen a 28-27 loss at home in their last regular season game to take the conference crown out from under them, and forcing them to take to the road in the first round of the NCAA playoffs. Connecticut, on the other hand, moved past UMass to grab a home game the following week in the eighth slot of the tournament.

Out of three total Minuteman losses last year on the way to the title, two came at the hands of the Huskies, who have taken five out of the last six against the Maroon and White.

"Our guys know what UConn is all about," UMass coach Mark Whipple said. "We have not beaten them in the last three games. They still have a lot of the same guys that played for them last year when they beat us. They are frightening. They know how to take care of business. We know what this game is about. It is about the playoffs, and UConn stands in our way."

Massachusetts holds a distinct advantage in the win-loss column, at 7-3 and 6-1 in the A-10, currently ranked No. 13 in the nation. During its six-game winning streak, UMass took victories in two tough environments in Delaware and William & Mary, and downed what was either the conference's top offense or defense in three different matchups.

"We are just glad to be home," Whipple said. "It seems like we have been on the road a long time. We have been to Maine and Delaware, and to Virginia twice in the last two weeks. I think this is going to be a great football game."

The Connecticut lineup might seem unfamiliar to the Minutemen, however, with different starters than in last season's finale at the running back, quarterback, wide receiver and tight end positions on offense. Neither of the two players responsible for the game-winning connection in that game, signal-caller Shane Stafford and wideout Carl Bond, will be playing in this year's contest.

Stafford's replacement, junior Brian Hoffman, who torched Massachusetts for a school-record 415 yards in a 44-41 overtime victory, kicker Jim McManus connected on a chip shot to give UConn the lead. It turned out to be the grand finale of an afternoon of offensive fireworks. UConn's Jordan Younger picked off a pass on the right sideline to send UMass home with a loss. Despite Hoffman's success against the Minutemen, he was benched in favor of youngster Luke Richmond last weekend against New Hampshire. Richmond has 410 yards and five touchdowns this year, along with four picks.

In that game, receiver John Hassinger hauled in six catches for 118 yards, and he will come to McGuirk as one of few returning stars for the Huskies. Hassinger has tallied 774 yards on 58 catches this year.

Running back Barry Chandler is another, teaming up with a new backfield mate this time around in Tamer Small, who leads the squad with 700 yards and 14 scores on the ground.

To combat this, the Minutemen will field nearly the same defense as it had last season, losing most notably linebacker Khari Samuel, who currently plays for the NFL's Chicago Bears. The linebacking crew that looks to enter Saturday's game is no worse for the wear, though, boasting Buck Buchanan Award nominee Kole Ayi, co-captain Matt Dawson and senior firecracker Dan Healey. The trio, along with freshman sensation Corey Potter, who suffered an injury in last weekend's bout with William & Mary, have combined for 16 sacks and five interceptions so far, while each has registered at least 40 tackles. Ayi leads the bunch with 125 takedowns.

In the defensive backfield, Richmond will see the vastly improved group who currently ranks second in the nation with 23 interceptions.

Connecticut's defense is led by linebacker Jamar Wilkins, who has 80 tackles on the season, and cornerback Roy Hopkins, who has 70.

It will be their job to contain Walter Payton Award finalist Marcel Shipp, UMass' all-time leading rusher and current Atlantic 10 Offensive Player of the Week after running for 210 yards and three scores against the Tribe last weekend. Shipp comes into the contest with 1,450 yards and 17 touchdowns on the season.

Responsible for the pass will be field general Todd Bankhead, who is third in the conference in passing yards and efficiency, and is the school's all-time leader in several career and season categories, including yards and touchdowns. His main focus will be sophomore Adrian Zullo, who leads the A-10 in receiving yards with 97.1 a contest, even after missing the first quarter last week for disciplinary reasons.

Collectively, their main focus will be getting in the playoffs.

"I think we need to win to get in," Whipple said. "When you look around, Youngstown State played two Division II teams. Villanova played at Air Force and had a tough schedule. Delaware had a tough schedule. I'm not saying anything against Georgia Southern, they've got a great team and great players, but they opened up with Fayetteville State. If we traded Toledo for a Division II team, if Villanova traded Air Force for a Division II team, if James Madison plays Fayetteville State instead of Virginia Tech, you are looking at three teams from the Atlantic 10 getting home berths.

"I hope the committee looks at that, and I think that our league is very good. We are trying to do all we can not to leave it in their hands. Last year, we lost to UConn and didn't know what was going to happen. We are just worrying about UConn right now, and then we will see from there. But I certainly hope the Atlantic 10 gets three berths."

Clean sweep prospect begins at Mullins with drop of puck

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

For the past 20 years, the Massachusetts and Connecticut athletic programs have engaged in battle in every common sport except one – ice hockey.

Part of the reason for the long layoff was the fact that the Minutemen were without a program from 1979-1995. However, when the Maroon and White reemerged on the scene, it made the quick jump to Division I play after only one season as an independent.

UConn, on the other hand, remained in either Division II or III during that span. In fact, it wasn't until the 1998-99 season when the Huskies finally moved up the final rung of the ladder to Division I as a member of the Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference.

Now, like a pair of long-lost brothers, UMass and UConn will reunite tonight at 7 p.m. in a non-conference matchup at the William D. Mullins Center. It will be the first game of a big weekend featuring the two border rivals. Both the football and men's basketball squads try their luck with the Huskies on Saturday and Monday nights, respectively.

"Initially [when UMass] moved to Division I] we didn't want to play them because they weren't Division I and their rink wasn't enclosed," UMass hockey coach Joe Mallen said. "Then when those things took place [UConn moving up to D-I and building an enclosed rink], it seemed like a good idea. This is good for the fans to see another UConn team to come in and play us."

Tonight's game will be an important one for the both teams, but especially for the host Minutemen. UMass [3-5-1, 0-4-1 in Hockey East] is winless in its last three games and is looking to get back on the winning track at any cost. Ironically, the Minutemen played well in those contests, but managed just a single point for their efforts.

"It has been frustrating on both the players and myself. We've been playing pretty good hockey. I think that we've been outshooting, outhustling and outhitting our opponents," Mallen said. "We just haven't been putting the number up on the board."

The Huskies [2-4] have not played any team other than from the MAAC or the CHA. UConn's wins have come over Bentley and American International College. In their last outing, the Nutmeg State school lost to Army, 6-3.

On the flip side, UMass defeated the Cadets 1-0 back on Oct. 29 for its long win of the season thus far. UConn is led by junior forwards Ciro Longobardi and Michael Goldkind. The two players are the top returning scorers for the Huskies. Both players had 25 points a season ago.

Other top players for UConn include freshman forward Kurt Kamienski (team-leading six points) and senior goaltender Marc Senerchia. The elder statesman of the bunch, Senerchia went 17-7-4 a year ago for the Huskies.

On the UMass side of things, senior winger Jeff Blanchard continues to pace the squad in scoring. He leads the club in both goals (four) and points (six) in the early going for the Minutemen.

Junior alternate captain Jeff Turner tops the team in assists (five) and is right behind Blanchard with the same number of points. Sophomore Martin Miljko tallied two goals in UMass' last game against Merrimack, and will look to light the lamp again this weekend.

Another underlying theme tonight will revolve around the personal ties for a host of players on both teams. UMass wingers R.J. Gates and I.R. Zavisza are both Connecticut natives and played with several current Huskies during their junior hockey days. In addition, UConn sports seven players on their roster who are Massachusetts products.

"This is a big game for myself because that's my state school. I have a lot of friends that go there and a lot of friends who play for UConn, said Gates, who hails from Plainville. "It's always been a healthy rivalry for other sports. The other teams have been able to thrive on it, and now it's our chance."

"UConn just upped their program to Division I, so this is a big game for them. They're going to come out with intensity," added Gates. "This may be a non-conference game for us, but we need to get a win under our belt. We're going to look at it like any other game and go out there and play our style."

Tonight's game will also be the first game at home for the Minutemen in two weeks. Of their first seven contests, only two have been at the Mullins Center. UMass will then close out a brief two-game homestand on Tuesday night against Vermont.

"So far we've played a majority of our games on the road. Northeastern beat Boston College, so they're a good team, and Merrimack tied Maine the night before they beat us, so they're a good team, too," Mallen said. "If we keep working hard, then the bounces will come.

Men's hoop tips off season against Gaels; UConn awaits

If a baby's first step is the most significant, the same can be said for the Massachusetts men's basketball team's season opener against Iona tomorrow night. Tip-off for the 1999-2000 season is slated for 7:30 p.m. at the Mullcahy Center.

Last year the Minutemen, who finished 14-16, were trounced 77-58 at home against the Gaels, who closed up shop at 16-14. It will hopefully be a different storyline for UMass this year, as it implements a new style of up-tempo play.

"We haven't gotten off to any fast starts since I've been here, so we've always taken a couple bumps early then turned it on in the middle," said UMass coach James "Bruiser" Flint. "I think getting off to a slow start individually hurts, more so than the team, because guys that got off to a slow start never turned it up. In the past we've had guys that have just been able to turn it up."

Senior co-captain Mike Babul and top returning scorer Monty Mack are looking to make a return into the lineup after sitting out the first two exhibition games. Mack suffered a stress fracture to his foot in the first week of October and has made a speedy recovery. Babul injured his back during the first week of practice and is listed day-to-day.

"They're learning every day they've got to get used to their movements, how much they can cheat off of people," said Flint. "Offensively, they'll come around; it's the defense that concerns me, especially when we're pressing."

Mack was the Minutemen's only double-figure scorer in what was arguably UMass' most disappointing performance. Mack tallied 16 points and four assists, but shot an abysmal 1-for-7 from behind the 3-point arc.

"Mike might not be as quick as Winston so he'll have to cheat off. The press is going to be the thing that suffers the most with those two guys back," Flint continued.

Last year's most improved player and returning starter is senior co-captain Chris Kirkland. The sleek and agile forward broke out of a sophomoric slump last year, finishing off with 10.2 ppg. Against George Washington, he totaled a career-high 26 points and 12 rebounds in 33 minutes. Kirkland has been steadfast in the frontcourt, shooting 21-for-30 from the floor in two exhibition games.

Sophomore Shannon Crooks has made an immediate impact in the backcourt. The St. John's transfer averaged 20.5 points per game in the two exhibition matches while living up to the early hype of being a flashy, off-the-dribble perimeter shooter.

"We have to rebound the ball and slash to the basket. We have to contain everybody and keep the turnovers down," said UMass Flint.

Joining Crooks is junior Jonathan DePina. Proving himself to be the most improved Minuteman so far, the lightning quick guard from South Boston High has more than doubled his minutes off the bench, netting 13 points in last week's 97-89 win over the Converse All-Stars.

Big man Kitwana Rhymer is left with the task of stepping into the Minutemen legacy of strong, reliable centers. The Virgin Islands native raked in 17 boards against the Converse All-Stars last Wednesday and averaged 12.5 points in the first two exhibitions games.

Solid contribution off the bench will be key for a UM victory. Wabash Valley College transfer JoAnn Johnson has been a solid contributor off the bench as a swing guard. True freshman Micah Brand added solid minutes in the middle and will continue to battle for time with Rhymer and senior Anthony Oates.

Iona will benefit from returning four of last year's starters including senior Tariq Kirksay, who earned All-MAAC first team honors after scoring his 1,000th point. The Bronx, NY native has recorded 16 career double-doubles. They will however be without leading rebounder Kashil Hameed, who dropped 27 points on the Minutemen last season.

Nakiea Miller impressed in the post during early exhibition games, tallying a game-high 17 rebounds to go with 16 points.

In last season's showdown, scoring came easy for the Gaels, as they scored 65 points in the paint to the Minutemen's 22. And if rebounding is a question mark coming into the season, Iona should quickly answer it. In the 19-point drubbing, the Gaels crashed the boards, outrebounding the Minutemen 46-32, including a 33-21 advantage on the defensive side. To add insult to injury, UMass shot a season-low 27 percent from the free throw line, connecting on just four of 15 attempts.

"They can score in the paint, it didn't matter who had the ball last year they scored on us. Of all the games last year, we were terrible defensively and we were never in the game. It'll be tough because they returned just about everybody. They just scored the first 16 points, and that just got them going. They beat us to every ball, they got every rebound, every loose ball. They made shots.

"Everybody's writing that we're not going to be any good, we've slipped and all this stuff like that. You have to prove to yourself that this stuff is not true," said Flint. "I think last year was a slap in the face because we lost to teams we know we shouldn't have lost to. If you can't get motivated by that then you can't get motivated."

Walkout demands aid from UM officials

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

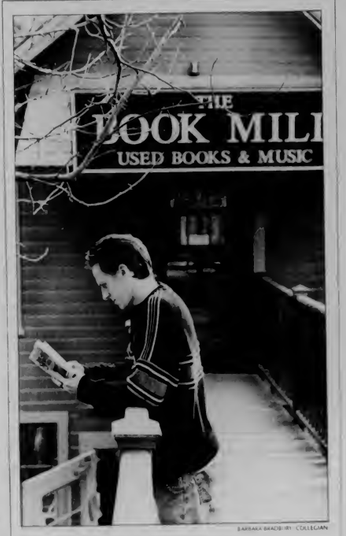
As a new week begins at the University, students remain concerned with their safety. Some feel that despite actions the administration has taken in the past week, it is "too little, too late."

With this mindset, volunteer students are continuing to take safety issues into their own hands, as they join together in a walkout this afternoon on the Student Union lawn.

The forum for "Hands around the Pond" addresses what the administration has yet to do to protect students, according to organizers. The group has put together a list of demands for the University administration. First and foremost, they want to have an open forum with the administration in which all information about the recent rapes and assaults on campus is accessible to students.

Although the group recognizes the recent actions taken by the administration, they feel they are not only coming too late, but are not entirely appropriate.

"I'm upset about the issue of clemency. I'm paying to go to school here. I want to go to classes and they need to provide a way for me to get to classes safely," one organizer, who wished to remain anonymous, said.



The woman said there was more that could be done to aid students than distributing shrick alarms and having professors allow absences from classes. The students do not agree with the administration's argument regarding a lack of funding.

"We deserve more and have the right to attend a safe university," student organizers said.

Some solutions they have come up with are incorporated with the actions they will be proposing today.

The actions include additional call boxes, a 24-hour parking lot patrol, and more concentration on 24-hour walking and van escort services. They feel that student security should have well-trained, well-paid receptionists in all dorms, and security should be provided on every floor of all libraries on cam-

Alarms, website as response to violence

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

After four assaults in less than three weeks, the University of Massachusetts has responded with continued police investigations and student-led rallies. The University administration, and specifically Chancellor David K. Scott, responded to students, informing them of various University-led initiatives concerning the assaults.

On Nov. 2, a student reported being raped near the Campus Pond. The following Tuesday, Nov. 9, a student reported being assaulted at the same location. The second assault is now being investigated as a rape. On Nov. 14, three students reportedly pepper-sprayed and then physically assaulted a woman near the Campus Pond, and during a rally last Tuesday, a woman was attacked by an individual who cut her with what was described by police as a common kitchen knife.

Scott sent an email to all students Friday explaining available safety measures and new information.

A web page has been set up to distribute information about all four assaults to anyone who is interested. Available at http://www.umass.edu/home/Campus_safety/, the website will be updated whenever new information becomes available to students.

Also, as the administration promised during last Tuesday's student-led rally outside of the Student Union, students will be able to acquire personal "shrick alarms." The alarms are free to anyone with a valid student or employee ID. Students living in residence halls can pick up alarms at their cluster office. Commuter students can get them at Commuter Services in the Student Union. Faculty can pick up their alarms at the Human Resources booth in the Whitmore Administration Building.

The alarms emit a shrill sound when thrown to the ground. Students who inappropriately use the alarms face punishments under the Student Code of Conduct.

Scott also stated in his email that the Faculty Senate had passed a motion that allows faculty members to be flexible regarding students who miss, or are late to, classes because of concern or fear. He also mentioned the Student Government Association would be having a safety rally this Tuesday, Nov. 23.

Furthermore, self-defense classes and anti-violence workshops are being added to existing schedules. The Everywoman's Center (545-0883), the Educator/Advocate Program (545-3474), and Student Affairs (545-2300) all have scheduled times and dates for workshops.

UM unions submit bid

Privatization on campus debated

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Three unions at the University of Massachusetts opposing privatization on campus are bidding to maintain control of the University Store and the Textbook Annex.

The unions, USA/MTA, SEIU 509, and AFSCME Local 1776, which belong to the Campus Community Labor Coalition, presented their bid to UMass Procurement Officials during a small rally at the Goodell Building last Friday. Union members, on-campus privatization opposition, and Representative Ellen Story from Amherst attended the rally.
